BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library
(August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks
(Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copyright law.

KREISLER RECEIVES FRIENDLY RECEPTION

Oct. 20

Shows Old Mastery in First Concert Here Since War

Fritz Kreisler was greeted by vehement and prolonged applause when he first came on the stage at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. It was his first Boston concert since the war and the audiance was bent on making it plain to him that they had forgotten that he has been for two years technically an "alien enemy," although never in any way active against the United States.

He was obviously moved by the friendliness of his hearers and played as even he has seldom played here before. The exquisite finish and perfection in detail of his performance always comes as a fresh surprise to the hardened concertgoer. He is a great musician as well as a great violinist. He plays even cadenzas, which are usually mere "stunts" without much profound musical significance, so as to make them seem things of beauty as well as tests of skill. His interpretation almost always conveys the composer's intention to the listener unobscured by any mannerisms or flaws of taste or technique on his part.

His first two groups on yesterday's program were taken from the great 18th century Italian writers for his instrument. They included a sonata by Tartini and concertos by Vivaldi and Viotti. Tartini and Vivaldi recall Bach and Handel, who admired and respected their work as German composers of our day have not been prone to admire Italian composers among their contemporaries. Viotti, a later and prolific writer, had a genuine melodic gift, but not much constructive power. Mr Kreisler played this old music as its composers, themselves virtuosi, would have played it if they could.

The remaining group of short pieces included a transcription of what is perhaps the most lovely of the Ballet numbers in Gluck's "Orpheus," No. 31 in the French partitur, ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," and Kreisler's new transcription of the "Hymn to the Sun" from Rimsky Korsakoff's opera "Le Coq D'Or," sung by Mabel Garrison at the Metropolitan performances. He had to repeat this and the following number, his own "La Gitana," and could have repeated the last number, his "Tambourin Chinois."

He then made up for his courteous but firm refusal to add extra numbers during the program by playing five encore numbers. This is a commendable compromise between the desires of those who care chiefly for the standard music on the regular program and those who prefer what one listener who stayed through the encores at the end yesterday called "gumdrops." Mr Kreisler plays these sugared trifles with as much taste as he shows in his classical numbers. Those who did not care for them were free to leave without missing any of the regular program.

STRIKING TRIBUTE TO KREISLER

Record Audience Greets Great Violinist at Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

As the Post predicted yesterday morning, the welcome Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, received when he played in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, after two years' absence from the concert stage, was one of the most impressive receptions ever given an artist in this hall.

HUNDREDS TURNED AWAY

The Sunday afternoon concerts, which have now become one of the most important elements in the musical life of Boston, are often scenes of great enthusiasm. Big audiences often gather there. Seats on the stage, aisles filled with people who stand, are frequent incidents of this annual concert series. But the audience yesterday afternoon probably outnumbered the largest audiences of the past. Not only was the stage filled so that Mr. Kreisler and his accompanist, Mr. Lamson, had but enough room to appear and play, but the aisles were so packed that those who sat in end seats were at times subjected to uncomfortable pressure.

Hundreds were turned away. Not another person could have been admitted, short of the ushers, who had one of the hardest tasks in their experience, breaking firmly established rules.

Remain to Worship

At the end of the concert, as everyone wanted to move toward the stage, and few went out, there was the spectacle of an enormous gathering rising to its feet, advancing a few paces, and listening for a good half hour to the playing of encores. The occasion would not have been complete if a young lady had not rushed forward afterwards and kissed Mr. Kreisler's hand. Still later, as he waited for his taxi in the artists' room, the window of which looks out on Westland avenue, a large crowd collected below to stare at Mr. Kreisler as he talked with a group of well-wishers, and finally to watch him depart in a taxi.

There had been a similar welcome when Mr. Kreisler played the day before in Philadelphia. It is evident that the American public will never lose its personal esteem as well as its artistic admiration of this virtuoso. It may be added that the best and the most generous feelings of the American public are never appealed to in vain. Mr. Kreisler was never more highly and affectionately regarded than when in the autumn of 1916 he voluntarily cancelled a long list of lucrative concert engagements, in order that political events should not be allowed to develop bitterness and animosity between himself and audiences which had supported him so long and so well.

Short and Well Made

Mr. Kreisler's programme was short and well made: Tartini's G minor sonata, Vivaldi's concerto in C major, Viotti's concerto in A minor, "Melodie," Gluck; ballet music from "Rosamund," Schubert; "Hymn to the Sun," from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Coq d'Or," transcribed for the violin by Mr. Kreisler, and two of Kreisler's compositions, "La Gitana" and the "Tambourin Chinois."

It was very interesting to compare impressions of this concert with others by violinists which have occurred during the past two years. The net result was to impress one more than ever with the beautiful and appealing qualities of Mr. Kreisler's art. There is first the inimitable beauty of his tone, a tone as big as you please, but very fine in quality and full of the subtlest shades of color, a tone which is the faithful reflection of the musical personality. Mr. Kreisler could not play without warmth and feeling. An instinctive musician of a very high order, he could not shape a phrase in any but a supremely beautiful manner. He could distort his phrases if he chose; he would, nevertheless, make them so eloquent and endow them with such conviction that it would take a hypercritical person to deny his pleasure and interest in the playing.

Artist Beyond Compare

There are violinists, we think, with a greater technic than Kreisler. One who has recently appeared, an amazing artist, is still more accurate, impeccable and brilliant a virtuoso than he. But with Kreisler one cannot remember technical considerations. He has, as a matter of fact, great skill and fluency, but these qualities are so subordinate to the musical idea that they are never noticed—which is the greatest possible tribute to an artist's technic.

There is the question of interpretation. We personally find in this virtuoso's performance an occasional tendency to sentimentality—but only in permissible places! Kreisler can play a Viennese waltz with a "heart-throb" in it as no other man. He can also discuss grandly Bach and Beethoven, while in conveying their grandeur he never forgets to be beautiful. There are players so absorbed in ideas, emotions, questions of musical structure, that they forget in their interpretation one most important point, namely, the sensuous beauty of music.

There is always beautiful, there is always art, in whatever Kreisler does. A great musician, he can do whatever he pleases. No wonder, with these qualities, that the audience applauded itself tired, and would not let him go.

This concert was testimony to another important thing. That is, the place Mr. Mudgett's concerts are taking in the artistic development of the city. They are not attended merely by those who have money and leisure, or those who study music. From all parts and from all classes of the population of Boston and its environs come the patrons of these concerts, which now play the part in our lives that concerts by great artists have played for years in Europe. These concerts, and the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, excellently patronized this season, are bringing great music to the people.

Pops in the Fall

Several seasons ago Fall Pops were tried at Symphony Hall, with some success, and again this year the effort will be made to see if Boston likes light music by a fine orchestra as well in September as in June.

If the plan succeeds it means that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be kept together for about forty-four weeks in the year, a longer season than any orchestra in the world.

Agide Jacchia will again conduct the Pops. Jacchia is rapidly learning American tastes in music and his programs are growing more ingenious and attractive every season. The Boston Symphony, despite predictions that it would never reassemble, during the strike last Spring, is said not to have lost a man of the band which finished out the season.

SEPTEMBER POPS

The Familiar Concerts at Symphony Hall to Be Resumed in Autumn Series—Orchestra, Conductor, Programmes and Arrangements Generally as in Spring

By way of interesting and promising experiment, the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall—a Bostonian institution from the beginning of May to the middle of July—are to be renewed for three or four weeks in September. The first of them is announced for next Tuesday evening and thereafter they will continue nightly (Sundays excepted) through Saturday, Sept. 25, and possibly through Saturday, Oct. 2. As the President likes to say in his diplomatic notes, they will be "identic" with the Pop Concerts of the spring and the summer. Seventy or eighty men from the Symphony Orchestra will play every evening. Again Mr. Jacchia will lead this orchestra, and no conductor of The Pops has been better liked. As usual his programmes will run the course that has long commended them to a widening public. As usual also there will be "special nights"—some for composers or groups of composers; some for clubs and the like, which have taken a part of the hall. Not a familiar arrangement has been altered. Tables and "refreshments," the privilege of smoking and the privilege of conversation, prices and the like, all remain as before. What the public of the concerts has approved—and never before in such numbers as last spring—it may still enjoy. In the main the programmes for the week—to be printed from day to day in this place—traverse familiar pieces that Mr. Jacchia, his orchestra and his hearers have long since tested. Thursday, however, brings a "Russian Night," with six pieces from Chaikovsky and others from Rakhmaninov, Borodin and Rimsky-Korsakov.

TRAN. SEPT. 4.

POPS OPEN TUESDAY

A gala opening night is anticipated for the Pops which are to make September nights in Boston musically eventful and in every way lively.

Agide Jacchia has compiled a model programme for Tuesday; the musicians of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra are rehearsing. That this occasion may be in every way brilliant, the interior of Symphony Hall has been regilded. There will also be more of the special nights. Thursday of the opening week will bring a Russian-Tschaikowsky programme, and an operatic night, a Wagner, a request night, and others may be expected. Of the institutions taking nights or parts of nights unto themselves for their own celebrations the Music Industries Convention, the Business Women's Club, Williams College are representative.

"Pops" Begin Again in Symphony Hall Tuesday Night

The "Pop" concerts will begin again in Symphony Hall next Tuesday evening and continue until the opening of the Symphony concert season Oct 8. Agide Jacchia, to whom the unprecedented popularity of the "Pops" last Spring was largely due, has made an attractive opening program.

That Tuesday night may be doubly brilliant, every table has been revarnished and the great organ and proscenium arch of Symphony Hall regilded. Nature's Autumn colors will make the stage festive.

There will be more of the ever popular special nights. Thursday of the opening week will bring a Russian Tschaikowsky program, and an operatic night, a Wagner, a "request night," and others may be expected. OPENING OF 'POPS' TUESDAY

Unlike Oliver Twist, the Pops public, asking for "more" in the early summer, will have their demand gratified by "more Pops." The fall season, which will open Tuesday, Sept. 7, breaks all Symphony Hall traditions. The illustrious musicians of the Boston Symphony orchestra are returning from mountains and sea to provide the music.

Mr. Jacchia, to whom the unprecedented popularity of the Pops last spring is largely due, has made a model program. Every table has been revarnished, and the great organ and proscenium arch of Symphony Hall regilded. Nature's autumn colors will make the stage festive.

FALL SEASON OF "POPS" IS OPENED

A five weeks' Fall season of the Pops was inaugurated last night in Symphony Hall with Agide Jacchia conducting.

In spite of the weather there was scarcely an empty table in the hall, while vacant seats in either of the balconies were few. The assemblage was conspicuously one of music lovers, who listened with wrapt attention to the program throughout and several times enthused so highly that encores were forthcoming.

Jacchia was given a hearty welcome.

SYMPHONY POP CONCERTS REVIVED

Agide Jacchia Receives Great Ovation

The Pop concerts, suspended on July 10, were revived at Symphony Hall last evening for a Fall season of practically five weeks under conditions that afford brilliant promise of success equal to that which usually attends the annual early Summer season.

In spite of the menacing weather there was scarcely an empty table in the hall, while vacant seats in either if the balconies were few. The assemblage was conspicuously one of music lovers, who listened with rapt attention to the program throughout and several times enthused so highly that encores were forthcoming.

Agide Jacchia, who began his fifth season as conductor of these concerts, was given a reception at his first appearance, which left no doubt of the high estimation in which his ability is held by the Pop patrons. It was refreshing to observe his unfailing practice of trying to direct the popular applause away from himself to his gifted band of musicians.

During the last two months Symphony Hall has been brightened up so that the $20,000 worth of gold which ornaments the proscenium arch and the balcony fronts, which had become somewhat subdued in tone by the weathering process, has been restored to its original brilliance. In fact, the hall looks as beautiful as it did at its opening, 20 years ago next month.

SYMPHONY OPENS FALL POP CONCERT SEASON

Large Audience Applauds Director Jacchia and Program

The fall season of Pop concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra held this year for the first time, opened last night at Symphony Hall. The opening brought out a large audience. Each number of the unusually attractive program was enthusiastically applauded, necessitating several encores.

Agide Jacchia, in his return as leader of the orchestra, was given an appreciative welcome.

The program:

March, "Father of Victory"	Ganne
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Waltz, "Espana"	Waldteufel
Intermezzo	Arensky
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia"	Delibes
Hindu Song from "Sadko"	Rimsky-Korsakoff

POPS IN SEPTEMBER

A "Fall Series" Well Begun at Symphony Hall—Balconies Versus Tables—Familiar Pieces Familiarly Played

By the signs of last evening, in September no less than in May or June, there is an audience for The Pops. It was as numerous as ever in the two balconies at Symphony Hall, where the listeners merely sit and hear as at any other concert; while on the floor it filled most of the tables. To the frequenters of them the frequenters of the balconies have long been a mystery. Pops are not Pops for the habitués of the floor, unless they can smoke at will, choose among the "refreshments" and chatter when desultory conversation seems more interesting than music. The faithful of the balconies may do none of these amusing things, seemingly care little for them. Sedately but with evident satisfaction, they listen to twelve orchestral pieces, variously chosen, variously played. Their only departure from the routine of concert-going is a bite or a sup in the longer intermissions. Yet bye and large, they are the most dependable public of The Pops. Most of the table-folk resort to Symphony Hall for the pleasure of an evening lazily spent against a musical background and with various non-musical hors d'œvres for seasoning. In contrast, they of the galleries seem interested in the music for its own sake, are mildly exacting over the quality of performance. Apparently this public has firm liking for miscellaneous concerts of orchestral music, not to severe of programme. Would it flock to them, say in winter, and with the whole concert-room as the balconies of Symphony Hall now are? No one knows, no one can know, until some one risks the test. It would be an interesting, possibly a fruitful, experiment.

To leave speculation—a somewhat smaller orchestra than "The Pops" of the spring assembled sat on the stage yesterday. It sufficed for the pending programme; but as yet it is not too well-balanced in the string choirs. They, rather than the wood-wind or the brass, lack the numbers and the volume of tone that through the next week returning players, back from "sum-

FALL POPS OPEN

Season Begins at Symphony With Large Audience

By J. V. CLARK

The much heralded fall season of Pops at Symphony Hall opened last evening to the delight of a very large audience and to the benefit of the coffers of the orchestra. The entertainment was as like many others in the spring season as possible. Favorite standard pieces stood on the program.

There was "Lohengrin" played sentimentally enough to suit the many loving couples scattered around the hall; the "1812" played with bombast and fury; the "Midsummer Night's" music done with considerable fleetness. Conductor and audiences at these concerts like bold effects and the orchestra produces them.

To many the Pops are the alpha and omega of good music; the concerts are the aesthetic food of a multitude in Boston. For this reason alone the concerts deserve the immense patronage they receive but there is another and greater reason why their success should be assured. These concerts swell the coffers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Vast sums of money are needed to maintain a great orchestra. Pop concerts are proving one of the most effective means of supporting the orchestra that in its best estate is the pride and glory of the city.

The present season will continue for a month with performances every evening excepting Sunday. The time may, and probably will, come when in order to satisfy demands of patrons these concerts will have to be given on Sunday evenings and at matinees. In the meantime good music, vigorously played, at price which the Italians, in speaking their musical affairs call "most popular," is serving to fill Symphony H again as it was filled night at night this spring and early sum

"Pops" Begin Again in Symphony Hall Tuesday Night

The "Pop" concerts will begin again in Symphony Hall next Tuesday evening and continue until the opening of the Symphony concert season Oct 8. Agide Jacchia, to whom the unprecedented popularity of the "Pops" last Spring was largely due, has made an attractive opening program.

That Tuesday night may be doubly brilliant, every table has been revarnished and the great organ and proscenium arch of Symphony Hall regilded. Nature's Autumn colors will make the stage festive.

There will be more of the ever popular special nights. Thursday of the opening week will bring a Russian Tschaikowsky program, and an operatic night, a Wagner, a "request night," and others may be expected. Of the institutions taking nights or parts of nights unto themselves for their own celebrations, the music industries convention, the Business Women's Club, Williams College are representative.

OPENING OF 'POPS' TUESDAY

Unlike Oliver Twist, the Pops public, asking for "more" in the early summer, will have their demand gratified by "more Pops." The fall season, which will open Tuesday, Sept. 7, breaks all Symphony Hall traditions. The illustrious musicians of the Boston Symphony orchestra are returning from mountains and sea to provide the music.

Mr. Jacchia, to whom the unprecedented popularity of the Pops last spring is largely due, has made a model program. Every table has been revarnished, and the great organ and proscenium arch of Symphony Hall regilded. Nature's autumn colors will make the stage festive.

There will be more special nights. Thursday will bring a Russian-Tschaikowsky program. An operatic night, a Wagner, a request night, and others may be expected. Of the institutions taking nights or parts of nights unto themselves for their own celebrations the Music industries Convention, the Business Women's Club, Williams College are representative.

FALL SEASON OF "POPS" IS OPENED

A five weeks' Fall season of the Pops was inaugurated last night in Symphony Hall with Agide Jacchia conducting.

In spite of the weather there was scarcely an empty table in the hall, while vacant seats in either of the balconies were few. The assemblage was conspicuously one of music lovers, who listened with wrapt attention to the program throughout and several times enthused so highly that encores were forthcoming.

Jacchia was given a hearty welcome.

SYMPHONY POP CONCERTS REVIVED

Agide Jacchia Receives Great Ovation

The Pop concerts, suspended on July 10, were revived at Symphony Hall last evening for a Fall season of practically five weeks under conditions that afford brilliant promise of success equal to that which usually attends the annual early Summer season.

In spite of the menacing weather there was scarcely an empty table in the hall, while vacant seats in either if the balconies were few. The assemblage was conspicuously one of music lovers, who listened with rapt attention to the program throughout and several times enthused so highly that encores were forthcoming.

Agide Jacchia, who began his fifth season as conductor of these concerts, was given a reception at his first appearance, which left no doubt of the high estimation in which his ability is held by the Pop patrons. It was refreshing to observe his unfailing practice of trying to direct the popular applause away from himself to his gifted band of musicians.

During the last two months Symphony Hall has been brightened up so that the $20,000 worth of gold which ornaments the proscenium arch and the balcony fronts, which had become somewhat subdued in tone by the weathering process, has been restored to its original brilliance. In fact, the hall looks as beautiful as it did at its opening, 20 years ago next month.

POPS IN SEPTEMBER

By the signs of last evening, in September no less than in May or June, there is an audience for The Pops. It was as numerous as ever in the two balconies at Symphony Hall, where the listeners merely sit and hear as at any other concert; while on the floor it filled most of the tables. To the frequenters of them the frequenters of the balconies have long been a mystery. Pops are not Pops for the habitués of the floor, unless they can smoke at will, choose among the "refreshments" and chatter when desultory conversation seems more interesting than music. The faithful of the balconies may do none of these amusing things, seemingly care little for them. Sedately but with evident satisfaction, they listen to twelve orchestral pieces, variously chosen, variously played. Their only departure from the routine of concert-going is a bite or a sup in the longer intermissions. Yet bye and large, they are the most dependable public of The Pops. Most of the table-folk resort to Symphony Hall for the pleasure of an evening lazily spent against a musical background and with various non-musical hors d'œvres for seasoning. In contrast, they of the galleries seem interested in the music for its own sake, are mildly exacting over the quality of performance. Apparently this public has firm liking for miscellaneous concerts of orchestral music, not to severe of programme. Would it flock to them, say in winter, and with the whole concert-room as the balconies of Symphony Hall now are? No one knows, no one can know, until some one risks the test. It would be an interesting, possibly a fruitful, experiment.

To leave speculation—a somewhat smaller orchestra than "The Pops" of the spring assembled sat on the stage yesterday. It sufficed for the pending programme; but as yet it is not too well-balanced in the string choirs. They, rather than the wood-wind or the brass, lack the numbers and the volume of tone that through the next week returning players, back from "sum-

FALL POPS OPEN

Season Begins at Symphony With Large Audience

By J. V. CLARK

The much heralded fall season of Pops at Symphony Hall opened last evening to the delight of a very large audience and to the benefit of the coffers of the orchestra. The entertainment was as like many others in the spring season as possible. Favorite standard pieces stood on the program.

There was "Lohengrin" played sentimentally enough to suit the many loving couples scattered around the hall; the "1812" played with bombast and fury; the "Midsummer Night's" music done with considerable fleetness. Conductor and audiences at these concerts like bold effects and the orchestra produces them.

To many the Pops are the alpha and omega of good music; the concerts are the aesthetic food of a multitude in Boston. For this reason alone the concerts deserve the immense patronage they receive but there is another and greater reason why their success should be assured. These concerts swell the coffers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Vast sums of money are needed to maintain a great orchestra. Pop concerts are proving one of the most effective means of supporting the orchestra that in its best estate is the pride and glory of the city.

The present season will continue for a month with performances every evening excepting Sunday. The time may, and probably will, come when in order to satisfy demands of patrons these concerts will have to be given on Sunday evenings and at matinees. In the meantime good music, vigorously played, at prices which the Italians, in speaking of their musical affairs call "most popular," is serving to fill Symphony H again as it was filled night at night this spring and early sum

FALL POPS ARE WELL ATTENDED

Symphony Hall Crowded to Hear Concerts by Noted Boston Orchestra

By FRED J. McISAAC.

Fall Pops again.

Symphony Hall, with its red tables, its merry waitresses, its ice cream, temperance drinks and music, is doing business at the old stand. Judging by the opening, Tuesday, and the audience last night folks enjoy good music in September just as much as they do in June.

I wonder if Bostonians really appreciate just what they get at these Pop concerts. New York, Philadelphia and other American cities have tried them, but couldn't make them go. European cities before the war possessed many cafe-concerts, but rarely with such an orchestra.

CONDUCTOR IS SKILLFUL.

Here we have a band of eighty men, almost the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by a skillful and popular leader, Agide Jacchia, playing the most tuneful pieces in both classic and popular repertory.

While you munch a sandwich, sip a lemonade, or gargle your ice cream, your ears are charmed by the "Blue Danube" (it's all right to play it again, though peace isn't officially declared yet), Gilbert and Sullivan or Gounod and Puccini.

Your thoughts wander back a few years to the days when you actually drank beer or wine as you listened to the Pops Orchestra. Did the music sound any better, or do you only imagine it did?

In those days the Pops Orchestra consisted of fifty or sixty men instead of eighty and the conductors were good fellows out of the orchestra, whose noble qualities didn't show in their batons.

WON'T SANCTION NONSENSE.

Here you have a stern operatic conductor who won't stand for any nonsense. And that reminds me of a story.

Some years ago Jacchia was conducting an opera troupe. One of the coloratura sopranos was a woman with a good voice, but rather a sketchy education. I was interviewing her. She was expressing her opinion of the conductors and it was a poor one regarding all but Jacchia. Him she admired.

"He's a real conductor," she said. "He doesn't care who is singing. You hit a wrong note and he'll throw his stick at you."

MUSIC TRADES CONVENE HERE

More Than 400 New Eng-England Delegates on Hand at Opening

BOOM BOSTON AS INDUSTRY'S CENTRE

More than 400 representatives of the music industries of New England arrived in Boston yesterday to attend the first annual convention of the New England Music Trades Association, the oldest music trades association in the country. The majority were from the larger cities of New England, but dealers in the smaller towns were well represented, as were the manufacturers and dealers in New York city.

Meeting for the purpose of booming the music industries in New England, and for bettering working conditions among the trade, a general feeling of good-fellowship, fostered by W. F. Merrill, secretary and treasury of the association and secretary of the convention, and W. P. Currier, prevailed.

To Make Boston Music Centre

Under the slogan, 'We'll put Boston on the map as a music industries trade centre," the Trades Association has endeavored to arouse greater efforts on the part of the dealers to boost New England manufactured products. As a consequence the lobby of the Adams House, the headquarters of the convention, was filled with groups of men and women discussing methods of increasing the demand for New England instruments.

Harry Stevens, President of the New England Music Trades Association; Edward S. Payson, W. S. Kimball, D. D. Luxton, E. E. Walter, Louis R. Dressler, John H. Fraw, B. P. Sibley, Fred H. Mann and John Anderson were among the prominent manufacturers and dealers who registered early.

Today at 11 o'clock the official business meeting of the convention will be held at the Villa Napoli, Nantasket beach, which is to be convention headquarters for the day. Following the business meeting there will be another get-together meeting in the form of an informal luncheon and dance.

The afternoon will be devoted to baseball, sports and dancing. At 5 o'clock there will be a typical New England shore dinner, after which the speakers of the day will be introduced, who will discuss progressive business methods as applied to the music industries of America.

The principal speakers will be Alfred L. Smith, general manager of the Music Industries Chamber of Commerce of New York city, Richard W. Lawrence, director of the same organization, and George W. Hopkins.

Last evening a special program arranged for "Music Industries Night" at the Pops was enjoyed by the convention members, who had proceeded to Symphony Hall en masse.

FALL POPS ARE WELL ATTENDED

Symphony Hall Crowded to Hear Concerts by Noted Boston Orchestra

By FRED J. McISAAC.

Fall Pops again.

Symphony Hall, with its red tables, its merry waitresses, its ice cream, temperance drinks and music, is doing business at the old stand. Judging by the opening, Tuesday, and the audience last night folks enjoy good music in September just as much as they do in June.

I wonder if Bostonians really appreciate just what they get at these Pop concerts. New York, Philadelphia and other American cities have tried them, but couldn't make them go. European cities before the war possessed many cafe-concerts, but rarely with such an orchestra.

CONDUCTOR IS SKILLFUL.

Here we have a band of eighty men, almost the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by a skillful and popular leader, Agide Jacchia, playing the most tuneful pieces in both classic and popular repertory.

While you munch a sandwich, sip a lemonade, or gargle your ice cream, your ears are charmed by the "Blue Danube" (it's all right to play it again, though peace isn't officially declared yet), Gilbert and Sullivan or Gounod and Puccini.

Your thoughts wander back a few years to the days when you actually drank beer or wine as you listened to the Pops Orchestra. Did the music sound any better, or do you only imagine it did?

In those days the Pops Orchestra consisted of fifty or sixty men instead of eighty and the conductors were good fellows out of the orchestra, whose noble qualities didn't show in their batons.

WON'T SANCTION NONSENSE.

Here you have a stern operatic conductor who won't stand for any nonsense. And that reminds me of a story.

Some years ago Jacchia was conducting an opera troupe. One of the coloratura sopranos was a woman with a good voice, but rather a sketchy education. I was interviewing her. She was expressing her opinion of the conductors and it was a poor one regarding all but Jacchia. Him she admired.

"He's a real conductor," she said. "He doesn't care who is singing. You hit a wrong note and he'll throw his stick at you."

SEPTEMBER POPS

The opening week of the Fall season of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall, now just ended, has shown by its record-breaking popularity that the Pop goers are as enthusiastic about these concerts in September nights as in the early Summer.

For the coming week there will be the usual special features, from the light and marvelously played musical programs to the refreshments and such sociable institutions. For Monday, Agide Jacchia, the conductor, has made an especially alluring opera program, and for Friday a program featuring the music of Wagner. For Tuesday and Wednesday (September 14 and 15) the Business Woman's Club and the Music Industries Convention, respectively, have taken portions of the hall for their own celebration.

As the World Wags

By PHILIP HALE.

The New York Times of last Sunday quoted an "official note" from the press agent of the National Symphony Orchestra of that city to this effect:

"Internal conditions in the Boston Symphony Orchestra led many to seek new fields, 12 premier players having found places in the National Symphony."

Will this passionate press agent kindly take the trouble to give the names of the 12 "premier" players that left the Boston Symphony Orchestra? Why does he find it necessary to say the thing which is not?

It was also stated in a New York newspaper a few days ago that Mr. Josef Adamowski, who has just returned from Warsaw, is favorably mentioned for the vacant conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Our excellent friend, violoncellist and teacher, Mr. Adamowski, will be the first to smile at this statement. Meanwhile the accomplished Pierre Monteux is preparing the Symphony programs for this season, not realizing that the position is "vacant."

FINAL "POPS"

Last Week of the Concerts Until Next Spring, with Many a Fresh Piece Upon the Programmes

THE final week of the autumn series of Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall will begin next Monday and end next Saturday, so that the orchestra may have seven days of repose before it begins work for the regular season under Mr. Monteux. Hence, until next May only six or seven concerts remain for the hearing of music at tables and to the pleasant accompaniment of tobacco and drinks à la Volsteadt. For those evenings Mr. Jacchia's programme include not a few pieces out of the routine of his lists: On Monday, for example, Strauss's waltz, "Tales from the Orient" and the ballet-music from Saint-Saën's opera, "Henry VIII"; on Tuesday a waltz by Lehár, "Gold and Silver" and the finale from a trio by Brahms for piano, violin and horn; on Wednesday, two pieces by young American composers—a Romance by Warren Smith and a symphonic poem, "King Lear," by Mr Little; on Saturday, Goldmark's overture to the Hindu play, "Sakuntala." For Thursday Mr. Jacchia will arrange a "request programme," according to the results of a ballot now in progress among the frequenters of the concerts. Friday will bring a "special night," with college songs for the alumni of Williams.

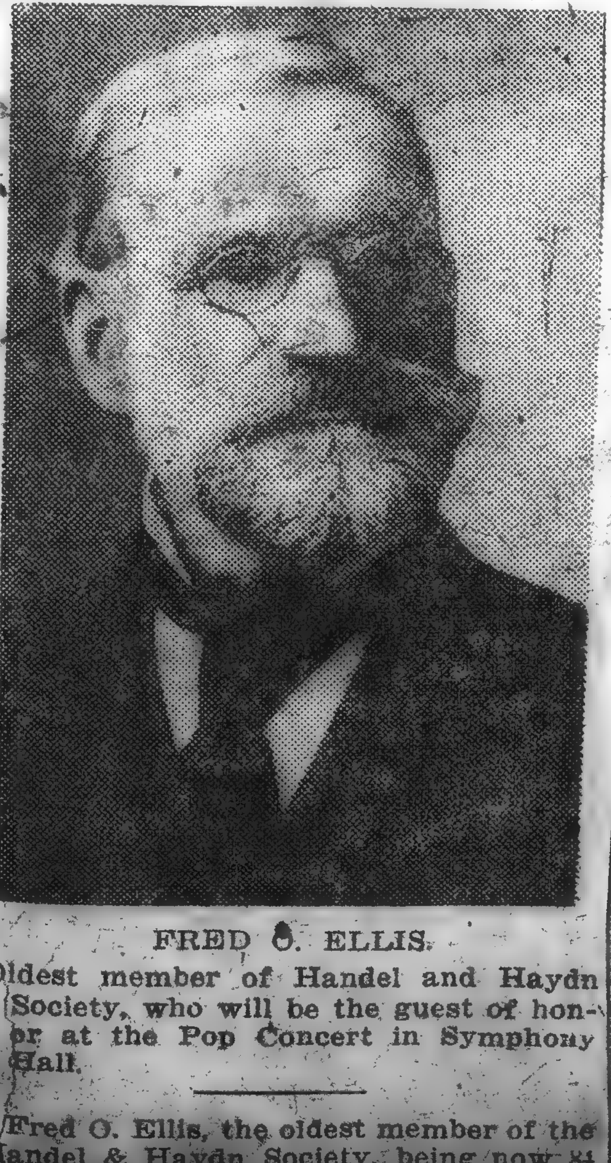
HONOR DEAN OF HANDEL-HAYDN

Fred Ellis, at 84, Society's Guest at the Pops



FRED O. ELLIS.
Oldest member of Handel and Haydn Society, who will be the guest of honor at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall.

Fred O. Ellis, the oldest member of the Handel & Haydn Society, being now 84 years of age, will be the guest of honor tomorrow night at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall, at which members of this noted chorus will celebrate. Mr. Ellis is but 20 years younger than the society, which is one of America's first musical organizations, having been founded in 1815.

Mr. Ellis was born in 1835 and joined the society in 1857, when the old Music Hall on Hamilton place, the original home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was also the official hall of the Handel & Haydn Society. Music Hall was then five years old and the newest thing in auditorium.

Mr. Ellis took part in the so-called three-day festival of the society, when C. Francis Chickering was its famous president. His military service in the Civil war did not prevent him from singing in the famous 20th Regiment concert of the society in 1862.

He has never missed a single performance of Handel's "Messiah," which the society gives yearly in Christmas week. The table of honor will be reserved for Mr. Ellis tomorrow night. Features of the programme will be selections from "Samson and Delilah" and "Aida," which recall recent performances by the Handel & Haydn Society.

As the World Wags

By PHILIP HALE.

The New York Times of last Sunday quoted an "official note" from the press agent of the National Symphony Orchestra of that city to this effect:

"Internal conditions in the Boston Symphony Orchestra led many to seek new fields, 12 premier players having found places in the National Symphony."

Will this passionate press agent kindly take the trouble to give the names of the 12 "premier" players that left the Boston Symphony Orchestra? Why does he find it necessary to say the thing which is not?

It was also stated in a New York newspaper a few days ago that Mr. Josef Adamowski, who has just returned from Warsaw, is favorably mentioned for the vacant conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Our excellent friend, violoncellist and teacher, Mr. Adamowski, will be the first to smile at this statement. Meanwhile the accomplished Pierre Monteux is preparing the Symphony programs for this season, not realizing that the position is "vacant."

FINAL "POPS"

Last Week of the Concerts Until Next Spring, with Many a Fresh Piece Upon the Programmes

THE final week of the autumn series of Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall will begin next Monday and end next Saturday, so that the orchestra may have seven days of repose before it begins work for the regular season under Mr. Monteux. Hence, until next May only six or seven concerts remain for the hearing of music at tables and to the pleasant accompaniment of tobacco and drinks à la Volsteadt. For those evenings Mr. Jacchia's programme include not a few pieces out of the routine of his lists: On Monday, for example, Strauss's waltz. "Tales from the Orient" and the ballet-music from Saint-Saën's opera, "Henry VIII"; on Tuesday a waltz by Lehár, "Gold and Silver" and the finale from a trio by Brahms for piano, violin and horn; on Wednesday, two pieces by young American composers—a Romance by Warren Smith and a symphonic poem, "King Lear," by Mr Little; on Saturday, Goldmark's overture to the Hindu play, "Sakuntala." For Thursday Mr. Jacchia will arrange a "request programme," according to the results of a ballot now in progress among the frequenters of the concerts. Friday will bring a "special night," with college songs for the alumni of Williams.

Fred O. Ellis, the oldest member of the Handel & Haydn Society, being now 84 years of age, will be the guest of honor tomorrow night at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall, at which members of this noted chorus will celebrate. Mr. Ellis is but 20 years younger than the society, which is one of America's first musical organizations, having been founded in 1815.

Mr. Ellis was born in 1835 and joined the society in 1857, when the old Music Hall on Hamilton place, the original home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was also the official hall of the Handel & Haydn Society. Music Hall was then five years old and the newest thing in auditorium.

Mr. Ellis took part in the so-called three-day festival of the society, when C. Francis Chickering was its famous president. His military service in the Civil war did not prevent him from singing in the famous 20th Regiment concert of the society in 1862.

He has never missed a single performance of Handel's "Messiah," which the society gives yearly in Christmas week. The table of honor will be reserved for Mr. Ellis tomorrow night. Features of the programme will be selections from "Samson and Delilah" and "Aida," which recall recent performances by the Handel & Haydn Society.

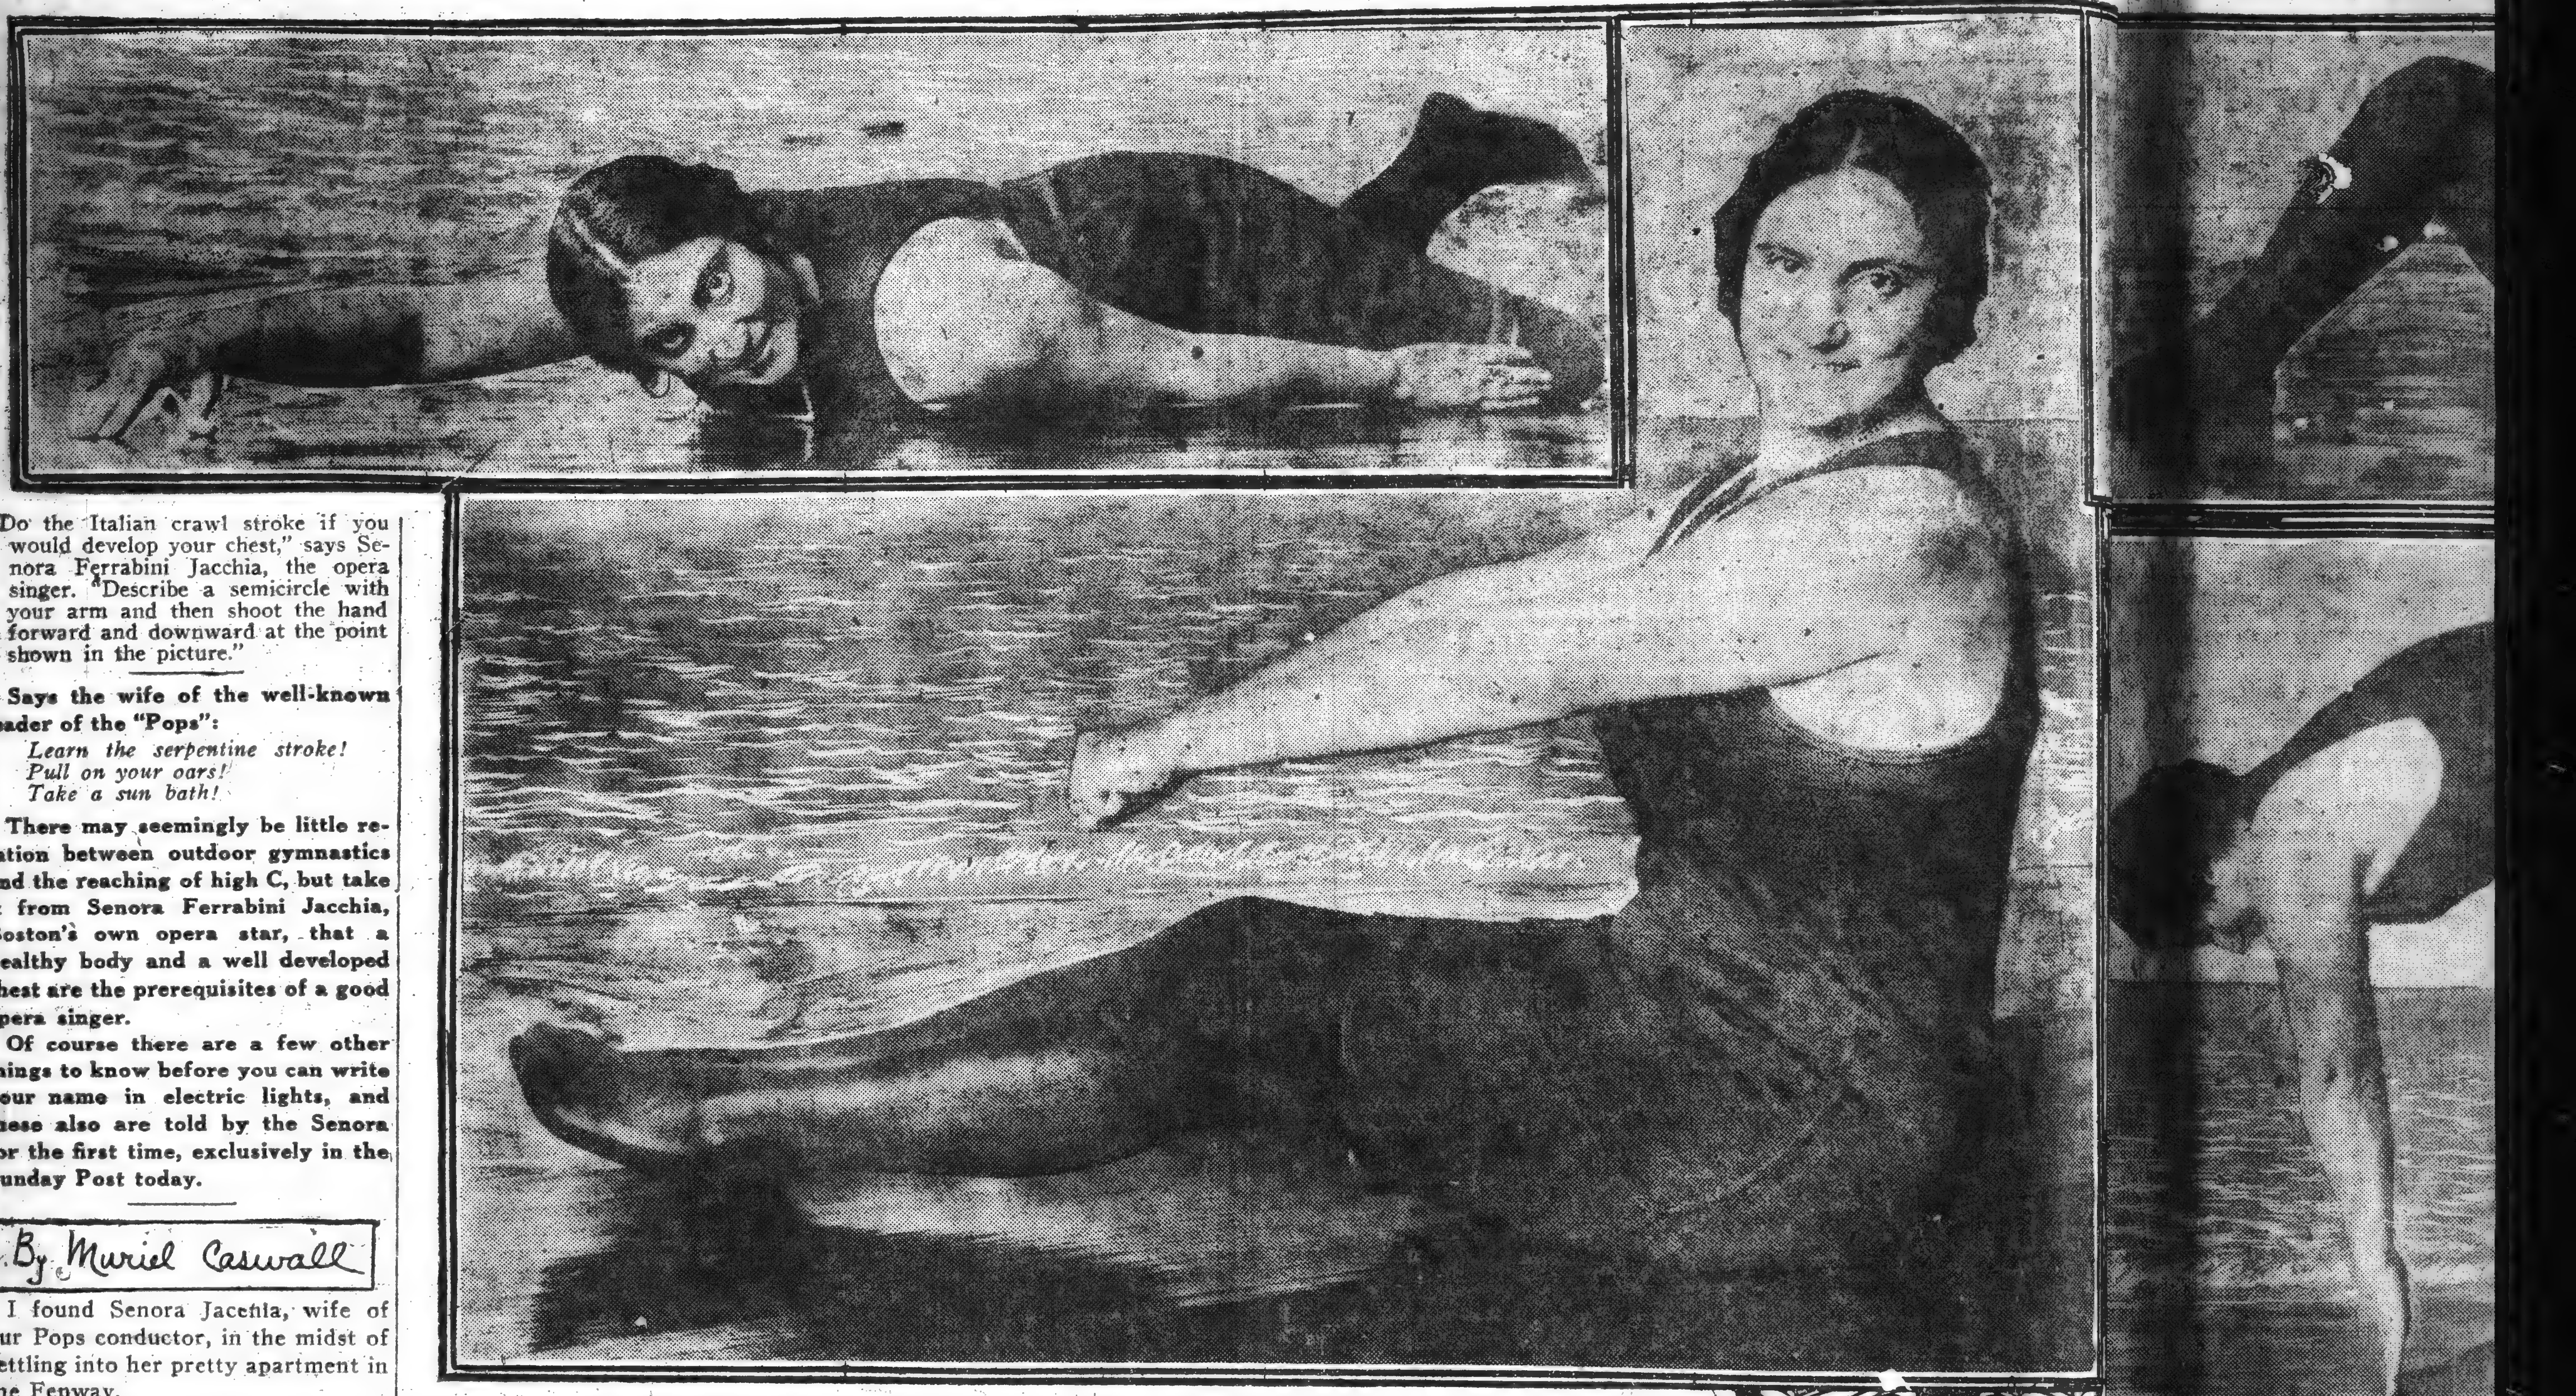
LEARN TO SING BY SWIMMING----WIFE OF "POPS" LE

Mme. Jacchia Illustrates Mystery of Serpentine Stroke and Other Exercises n Special Pose



"Rowing is as good as swimming to strengthen the back and chest muscles and arms. In fact, it brings into play most of the muscles in the body."

"Do the Italian crawl stroke if you would develop your chest," says Senora Ferrabini Jacchia, the opera singer. "Describe a semicircle with your arm and then shoot the hand forward and downward at the point shown in the picture."

Says the wife of the well-known leader of the "Pops":

Learn the serpentine stroke!
Pull on your oars!
Take a sun bath!

There may seemingly be little relation between outdoor gymnastics and the reaching of high C, but take it from Senora Ferrabini Jacchia, Boston's own opera star, that a healthy body and a well developed chest are the prerequisites of a good opera singer.

Of course there are a few other things to know before you can write your name in electric lights, and these also are told by the Senora for the first time, exclusively in the Sunday Post today.

By Muriel Caswall

I found Senora Jacchia, wife of our Pops conductor, in the midst of settling into her pretty apartment in the Fenway.

Apparently she brought with her to America a few scoops of the warm blue waters of the Adriatic and a handful of Italy's sunshine, for the Senora seemed to be framed in a nimbus of blue and sunbeams whichever way she moved. And she herself wore, on arms and neck and face, a rich brown coat of seashore tan heightening to a tea-rose on either cheek.

"Oh, I am glad to have a home with my family around me at last!" declared this charming opera singer from the depths of a blue velvet divan. What a picture she made, I thought, with her brown eyes alight under her dark hair, her simple white frock with an odd little pink lace apron of foreign make, and her long browned arms resting on the velvet.

It came to me as I took in her tall, stately build, ample chest, broad shoulders—the whole brimming with life, health, youth—that she must have a message to give, a message of health and self-development, to young Boston singers—or in fact, to all women, in business or in the home, who desire to get the most out of life.

"An opera career is pretty strenuous, I suppose," I took her up.

"Well, I don't find it so," the Signora replied in her soft Italian accent. "I will not let it be so," dropping her head back on the velvet and arching her eyebrows expressively. "Take it easy—and be natural; that is my advice to all singers." She sat up suddenly. "There is too much of this—and this—and this!" She illustrated various poses of stiffness and effort, elevating the chin, drawing up the shoulders, making the features tense. "There should be no tightening, but a loosening," wriggling her shoulders and waving her arms. "Be natural, and it follows that you will then avoid being unnatural!" she finished with a merry laugh.

Express Feelings Naturally

"But," I couldn't help objecting, "don't you have to be eternally practising? Isn't that part of it strenuous?"

The singer shrugged. "It is enough to practise half an hour a day," came the startling piece of advice. "These hours and hours of singing are unnecessary and hurt the voice. You do not need to overwork the voice to find if you have got one.

"'The trouble is," she said, sobering, "young singers try to learn too much—too many operas. Instead of learning three or four very thoroughly they cram and cram and sing ten operas very badly, overstrain their voices and overdo their bodies. Only failure can follow that sort of training.

"In Italy we believe in simplicity in training and simplicity of manner in singing. We do not need to study dramatics, because it comes natural to us to act—to express our feelings with proper gestures and expression. There is no need to fling your arms about—so!" Up went the long, graceful arms with a force that would carry her 10 yards as a swimming stroke. "Or to roll your eyes up—so! But just let the feeling of the song express itself naturally through you, and you will find yourself doing the right things — the simple things."

She jumped up quickly—her movements were remarkably rapid for such a large body, which showed the perfect command she has over her body—took her stand in a stiff pose, and went on, in her emphatic way: "If a young singer is told, 'Now you must hold your chest like this; and your arms like this; and your head like this—not too far up, not too far down,' do you think she could ever forget herself long enough to sing freely and naturally? No.

"You mustn't worry about anything at all, if you would be a great singer. Remember your little slang expression, 'I should worry,' and learn to shrug your shoulders at things that don't matter. If someone says to me after a performance, 'You sang that last song dreadfully,' do I run off and cry? Not much! I shrug my shoulders, because I know that there are 100,000 others, perhaps, who like the way I sing. If I can please my audience as a whole, I shall not worry if two or three——"

Bambino Looks Like Father

"Oh, mamma mia!" shrieked a child's voice, and the Jacchia bambino burst into the room and rushed for shelter in the maternal skirts, jabbering torrents of Italian. I was introduced, and Elsa, aged seven, made a pretty little curtsy and hid her laughing face—the image of her father's—in the blue velvet billows behind her mother. She is a regular little tomboy, I was told, though she loves to watch her father conduct the Symphony Orchestra, and she knows how to handle the baton in all its complicated movements.

No, she didn't sing, her mother said. "Though when I was her age I had decided to become an opera singer." The senora walked to the window and looked out over the Fenway, which she probably did not see at all, for her thoughts were in another country. "My mother took me one night to see 'Il Trovatore' when I was 7. Oh, the thrill of that first opera! My little knees knocked each other all through the evening. We sat in a box close to the stage, and I lived every bit of the story in song. The next day I went into the garden and sang the whole opera to the birds." She threw back her head and laughed with girlish freedom.

"If only we could always be so confident and so natural in our singing! But really," she turned back into the room and paused to send Elsa flying with some soft Italian admonitions, "really the opera singer must take life easy. She must sleep a lot and never worry about anything. So, you see, it requires a certain kind of temperament to become an opera or concert singer. Many could not stand the life—the discouragements, the strains, the frivolity, the criticisms. You simply cannot take it seriously. By that," she hastened to add, "I don't mean you must not take your studies seriously.

"When I was to play 'Carmen' for the first time I studied all I could about that type of girl and tried to make the part just as realistic as I could. And I found that 'Carmen' is the hardest of all the operas—and the most difficult part to take."

Many Artists Overeat

As a matter of fact Mrs. Jacchia is one of the most successful of all the "Carmen" singers. She has taken the part 150 times in this country and abroad and won the highest praise from critics on both sides.

But I was wondering now how far an artist could go on the "take it easy" programme. Taking it easy is, of course, the easiest thing to take; it's the line of the least resistance—in fact, the rut of least resistance, and once in, it is not so easy to get out. I spoke of this, and the senora laughed.

"Yes, of course that it true. Artists are inclined to be too easy-going, to be lazy and to overeat. It is the young ones, who haven't arrived yet, who think they must work themselves to death. We need to take plenty of exercise, of course, for the life we lead is inclined to make us fat and lazy. I don't believe in violent gymnastics and unnatural methods of development. I have no patience with those singing teachers who make you lie down on the floor and heap books on your chest, and then tell you to raise your diaphragm up and down to develop your muscles. It is too strenuous, and unnecessary. Singing and breathing should be done as naturally as talking.

"Rowing is the best sort of exercise for developing the chest and shoulders," she went on, from the piano stool. "I spent a great deal of time this summer rowing in the Adriatic. I am very fond of swimming, too, and swimming is good if you are inclined to be too fat. But I must admit that it is not the best thing for the voice itself. But the motions of swimming are splendid for development, and can be done on dry land almost as well as in the water.

"There is one particular swimming

"Now I will show you how not to develop your chest. This is an unnatural way and overstrains the muscles, besides being a very uncomfortable trick to do."

"This is not as easy as it looks. It took me quite a while to complete this loop with my body. You can't find a better exercise than this for the digestive organs and for keeping the waistline down."

velopment, and can be done on dry land almost as well as in the water.

"There is one particular swimming [illegible] we [illegible] in Italy, which I will illustrate," [illegible] the Signora jumped to [illegible] went through the movements with the agility of a panther.

"Now you see," she explained, repeating it more slowly, standing erect with hands beside knees, "I swing my right hand round and up in a semi-circle, and when it reaches the top of the circle," she illustrated, "I cut down through the water with a serpentine movement, with hand stiffly pointing forward. While I am doing this I am drawing up my left leg, and as my hand cuts down sharply, I kick back my left leg. My body rolls slightly to one side as I do this; then I reverse the movement with my left hand and right leg, and so on.

"It is very simple," she smiled. "All natural exercise is simple. Look how simple a sun bath is—that is one of the best methods to build up the system, too. Just relax on the sand, let go every nerve and muscle and let the sun beat on your chest and body for hours.

Likes Home Life Best

"Walking is another extremely useful exercise. It brings into play every part of the body, and is not over-violent motion. If you can walk naturally and gracefully, you have mastered the 'art' of stage presence. So many singers seem to think they must 'mince' out onto the stage, or drag their limbs in long sweeping undulating motions," she swept up and down the room with tiger-like movements in illustration, "but I prefer to enter the stage as I enter my own drawing room to meet my friends—like this—and nothing could be simpler or more unaffected than madame's quiet firm stepping across the room.

"And when I stand by the piano to sing"—she took up her place beside the magnificent new ebony grand piano, a present from her husband—"I do not stand as if I am to be shot—like this with my body like a ramrod and my head held low with throat muscles tense—but so!" She lounged gracefully with an arm on the piano and her body at ease.

"Oh, it is no use to ask me how I do this and how do I do that," she said earnestly. "There is no 'how' except just this—be natural! Treat your audience as if they were your friends meeting you in your own house. Meet them simply and naturally—and the mechanics of singing will take care of themselves.

"But beware of your diction!"—she put up a warning finger. "I have heard singers with beautiful voices fly up and down the scale and do wonderful things, but they might have been singing about onions, for I could not make out a word they sang. Every syllable should be clearly enunciated and come freely from the throat, without any attempt to tighten the muscles or muzzle the voice. Now," she threw at me with a giggle, "you know how to be a great singer—yes?"

There was one other thing I wanted to ask her, and I did so at risk of exhausting her great good-nature. It was about the opera singer sacrificing home life for career.

"Well," Mrs. Jacchia replied thoughtfully, "if she has a good sized family I think she must, although, of course, there is Madame Schumann-Heink as a shining exception. With me, I have only one bambino. Elsa goes with me everywhere and I will not leave her to others to bring up. I want my child to be my very own. I care for her and make her own clothes myself. But if I had several children I could not take them with me and care for them—it would be impossible. I like home life and I cannot have it while I am singing, so I have taken first one, then the other—last year I sang; this year I have a home, and I am very glad," she smiled, "that is in Boston!"

Streets Link Boston to Past

The names of the streets and lanes of Boston are closely linked with the historic past. Others there are which could be connected with Boston only, such as Tremont street, a corruption of "Tri-mountain," by which name Boston was known to the early settlers on account of the three high hills that serve as a background to the peninsula. This replaced the name "Shawmut," given to it by the Indians. May Harrod Northend writes in the Century Magazine that the streets of this quaint city in the East were laid out by straying cattle.

After the Revolution the names of many Boston streets were changed. Queen street became Court street and King street the State street of today. School street took its name from a school that was erected there. Dark alleys, leading off the principal streets on every side, were named after pathways, usually depending on where they led to. Creek lane originally led to the old creek. It was in tavern days that this was the centre of stage-coach life. The old Customs House once stood on Flag alley. Corn court took its name from the fact that the corn market was at one time situated there. Summer street was once known as Seven Star lane. It is now one of Boston's busiest streets.

THE POPS AND BRAHMS

His Horn Trio Slips Into a Programme and Is Well Played—Other Incidents

IN Mr. Ernest Hoffmann, now joining his father among the first violins at the Pop concerts, the Symphony Orchestra has a very capable pianist. In the present series of concerts the playing of the celesta has fallen to him and he has handled the little instrument with much skill, notably in tthe Fantasia from Leoni's "L'Oracolo" last Friday. On other occasions he has provided the piano accompaniment for solos, and last night he made possible the performance of a movement from Brahms's Trio for violin, horn and pianoforte, Opus 40—a novel item for a Pop programme. Companioning him were Mr. Jacques Hoffmann and Mr. Hess. The piece, which has been rather neglected here of late, was a great favorite of Mr. Kneisel and judging from the Finale played last evening it would be well worth hearing. However insensitive Brahms may have been to the individuality and characteristic voice of other instruments he had a peculiar regard for the horn and his writing for it was unfailingly sympathetic and effective. A note in the score suggests that in this trio it may be replaced by a 'cello or viola, but the galloping figure on which this finale is based would be quite unsuited to either instrument. The movement was brilliantly played and in response to the applause the three players added to the programme arrangement of Rakhmaninov's half exotic Serenade.

More or less accustomed numbers filled the rest of the concert. For novelty it included a Processional March by Edwin L. Turnbull of the department of music at Johns Hopkins University, formal and sonorous, and the Finale of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony—the latter, of course, new only to the Pops. Such impulsive, strongly rhythmed music suits Mr. Jacchia well and it would be a pleasure to hear from him the first movement as well. For contrasting Viennese waltzes there were Lehár's "Gold and Silver" and the older "Vienna Beauties" of Ziehrer. The former is sensuous and effectively orchestrated, but in the latter is the true Viennese swing which somehow eludes the moderns. Even Richard frankly aping Johann could not quite achieve it.

MONTEUX TO CONDUCT

Famous Artists Engaged to Appear for Series of Concerts.

Looming upon the horizon of Washington's approaching musical season is the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given under the direction of Mrs. Wilson-Greene at the New National Theater, for which tickets by subscription are now being sold.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, whose sympathetic readings and administrative skill were so well-liked last season, and whose wisdom and initiative in the making of programs were so warmly praised, will continue as leader. Returning recently from Europe, where he has spent the summer, he brought with him some scores of much promise. Mr. Monteux's proficiency with the accepted masterpieces of the orchestral repertory is, however, of the first importance.

The historically eminent Boston Symphony Orchestra assembles this season virtuosi of the highest skill which our time affords, in readiness to celebrate according to the best of its traditions its fortieth anniversary.

The Washington concerts are to take place on the following five Tuesday afternoons: November 2, November 30, January 4, February 1, March 15. Each of them will be made the more interesting by the assistance of one of the foremost soloists available. There will be two sopranos, Helen Stanley, whose sudden and complete fame as a star of the Chicago Opera Company several seasons ago was only equalled by her subsequent recital tours of the United States. Hulda Lashanska, the Scandinavian soprano, is also a favorite in every city where beautiful singing is heard. The stamp of her striking individuality and the suggestion of northern blood notably colors her interpretations. Among the violoncellists now in America, Jean Bedetti, the leader of that golden-toned section of the great orchestra, is fast taking a foremost place. He came to this country last winter from France, where he is ranked as the first of his instrument.

JOURNAL 19
Providence, R. I.

Of special interest to Providence concertgoers are the prospective programmes of the Boston Symphony. By all the signs there will be more new music played in this country than for the past few years. Composers overseas known to this country by name alone are about to be heard. Now that the war is over and communication for other than war purposes made possible, the work of these newcomers is being drawn upon.

Mr. Monteux's pilgrimage abroad has been fruitful in the acquisition of some of these new prizes. He has been discriminating in his search for novelty and for the worth while. A forecast of the coming Boston Symphony season, which begins next month, is given in this excerpt from the Transcript:

"So far as the conductor can accomplish his present plans, English composers from Bantock to Bax will enjoy their first considerable inning at the Symphony concerts. Four of the 'new' Italians, who cultivate symphonic music, will have place. There will be room for the rising Spaniard, de Falla, and for the risen Parisians, Milhaud and Roger-Ducasse. Music of one of the younger Russians, Vassilenko, will be played for the first times in America.

"An unheard symphony—his third—by Sibelius, the Finn, is in prospect, along with the suite for the concert hall that Mr. Carpenter has assembled from his ballet, 'The Birthday of the Infanta,' and a new tone-poem by Mr. Hill, suggested by Poe's grewsome tale 'The Fall of the House of Ussher.' From the classics, likewise, Mr. Monteux is minded to rediscover to his hearers at Symphony Hall Schubert's 'Tragic Symphony,' by way of variation from the endlessly repeated 'Unfinished' and 'Ninth;' the gay overture to Mozart's opera 'Il Seraglio' and his prelude to 'Don Juan;' and two overlooked concertos of Bach to be played as ensemble pieces—one with violin, flute and piano for outstanding instruments and one with the organ in like place.

"Two symphonies by English composers stand high on Mr. Monteux's list of new pieces—Vaughan-Williams's 'London Syphony' and Bantock's symphony, 'The Hebrides.' No music in the larger forms by the younger Britons has been more applauded than this 'London Symphony,' reaction in tones to the life, atmosphere and stimulus of the Britons' city. In a sense it is 'the piece of the hour;' for in America next winter it will be heard in Boston, New York and Chicago.

"In recent years Bantock's symphony has made the round of English concert rooms. The aspect and the spirit of these wild islands in the North Atlantic kindled the composer to the music. The melodic material he has drawn from the islanders' folk tunes. To one of the youngest and most individual of English composers Mr. Monteux has also given ear—Arnold Bax—and one or another piece of his symphonic music is fairly certain to gain place on the conductor's programmes. He likes, too, the vigor, the onrush, the eminently British quality of John Ireland."

The season of "Pop Concerts" in Symphony Hall, the home of the orchestra in Boston, has been curtailed in order that full preparations and immediate preparations might be undertaken. Pierre Monteaux, the conductor, has discovered a number of highly interesting new scores during his summer's stay in Europe, notably by the young Italian composers Respighi di Sabata, Malipero, and Cassella; by Darius Milhaud from France, and of the Russians, Stravinsky, Vassilenko and Kalinnikoff.

John Alden Carpenter and E. B. Hill will represent the native composers. Novelties will be duly balanced, however, by the great classics of enduring fame and popularity. The Symphony season in Boston is to open on October 8 and 9.

The approaching season of Boston Symphony concerts, of which five will be given here as usual, will mark the fortieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Pierre Monteaux, who became conductor last year, will remain at his post.

The five concerts will be made the more memorable by the appearance at each of a notable singer or virtuoso. Erno Dohnanyi, the celebrated Magyar pianist and composer, is coming to this country after an absence of many years, and will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra again.

Symphony Concert Master.

Replacing Frederick Fradkin as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Richard Burgin, a native of Warsaw, who comes to this country with a record of continental achievement behind him and fame as concert master and soloist.

Mr. Burgin began his violin studies at the age of 5 with Lotti. Beginning in 1908 he went through four years of training under Leopold Auer at Petrograd, Jascha Heifetz being a fellow pupil. He then made a concert tour of Russia, Poland and Scandinavian countries, being soloist and concert master of the Petrograd Symphony Orchestra, the Stockholm Concert Society Orchestra, the Christian Philharmonic Society and the Helsingfors Symphony Orchestra. He was soloist in the first public performance of the violin concerto by Sibelius at the Stockholm Opera House, and played in the same work under the composer at Helsingfors. He has played also with Nikisch, Max Fiedler and Richard Strauss. He formed the Burgin Quartet in Stockholm, and also a quartet from the Philharmonic Society in Christiania, which went on tour for a number of seasons. His first public appearance was with the Philharmonic Orchestra of Warsaw. When a boy of 13 he lived for a few months in New York. He began his work with the Boston Symphony at the first rehearsal last week under Conductor Monteux.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now preparing for one of the busiest seasons in its history. Of the 110 concerts scheduled, ten will be given in Carnegie Hall as usual—on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, November 6 and 8, December 4 and 6, January 8 and 10, February 5 and 7 and March 18 and 20. Also, as usual, the seats for all concerts are engaged in advance, although any wishing to become applicants should write to W. H. Brennan, Symphony Hall, Boston. In other cities as well, for the season to come, all concerts are even now sold out by subscription.

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, is sparing no pains to make the pending season exceptional. In France during the past Summer he collected a large number of new scores—French, Italian and Russian—from which, with his reputation for making known new music of genius, much may be expected. He also bears in mind several American works of worth. He does not intend in any way to slight the classics, nor will he bar Wagner or any great music which the American public desires. In Boston rehearsals are now under way, for the initial concerts will take place there on October 10 and 11.

Looming upon the horizon of Washington's approaching musical season is the series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given under the direction of Mrs. Wilson-Greene at the New National Theater, for which tickets by subscription are now being sold.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, whose sympathetic readings and administrative skill were so well-liked last season, and whose wisdom and initiative in the making of programs were so warmly praised, will continue as leader. Returning recently from Europe, where he has spent the summer, he brought with him some scores of much promise. Mr. Monteux's proficiency with the accepted masterpieces of the orchestral repertory is, however, of the first importance.

The historically eminent Boston Symphony Orchestra assembles this season virtuosi of the highest skill which our time affords, in readiness to celebrate according to the best of its traditions its fortieth anniversary.

The Washington concerts are to take place on the following five Tuesday afternoons: November 2, November 30, January 4, February 1, March 15. Each of them will be made the more interesting by the assistance of one of the foremost soloists available. There will be two sopranos, Helen Stanley, whose sudden and complete fame as a star of the Chicago Opera Company several seasons ago was only equalled by her subsequent recital tours of the United States. Hulda Lashanska, the Scandinavian soprano, is also a favorite in every city where beautiful singing is heard. The stamp of her striking individuality and the suggestion of northern blood notably colors her interpretations. Among the violoncellists now in America, Jean Bedetti, the leader of that golden-toned section of the great orchestra, is fast taking a foremost place. He came to this country last winter from France, where he is ranked as the first of his instrument.

JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

Of special interest to Providence concertgoers are the prospective programmes of the Boston Symphony. By all the signs there will be more new music played in this country than for the past few years. Composers overseas known to this country by name alone are about to be heard. Now that the war is over and communication for other than war purposes made possible, the work of these newcomers is being drawn upon.

Mr. Monteux's pilgrimage abroad has been fruitful in the acquisition of some of these new prizes. He has been discriminating in his search for novelty and for the worth while. A forecast of the coming Boston Symphony season, which begins next month, is given in this excerpt from the Transcript:

"So far as the conductor can accomplish his present plans, English composers from Bantock to Bax will enjoy their first considerable inning at the Symphony concerts. Four of the 'new' Italians, who cultivate symphonic music, will have place. There will be room for the rising Spaniard, de Falla, and for the risen Parisians, Milhaud and Roger-Ducasse. Music of one of the younger Russians, Vassilenko, will be played for the first times in America.

"An unheard symphony—his third—by Sibelius, the Finn, is in prospect, along with the suite for the concert hall that Mr. Carpenter has assembled from his ballet, 'The Birthday of the Infanta,' and a new tone-poem by Mr. Hill, suggested by Poe's gruesome tale 'The Fall of the House of Ussher.' From the classics, likewise, Mr. Monteux is minded to rediscover to his hearers at Symphony Hall Schubert's 'Tragic Symphony,' by way of variation from the endlessly repeated 'Unfinished' and 'Ninth;' the gay overture to Mozart's opera, 'Il Seraglio' and his prelude to 'Don Juan;' and two overlooked concertos of Bach to be played as ensemble pieces—one with violin, flute and piano for outstanding instruments and one with the organ in like place.

"Two symphonies by English composers stand high on Mr. Monteux's list of new pieces—Vaughan-Williams's 'London Symphony' and Bantock's symphony, 'The Hebrides.' No music in the larger forms by the younger Britons has been more applauded than this 'London Symphony,' reaction in tones to the life, atmosphere and stimulus of the Britons' city. In a sense it is 'the piece of the hour;' for in America next winter it will be heard in Boston, New York and Chicago.

"In recent years Bantock's symphony has made the round of English concert rooms. The aspect and the spirit of these wild islands in the North Atlantic kindled the composer to the music. The melodic material he has drawn from the islanders' folk tunes. To one of the youngest and most individual of English composers Mr. Monteux has also given ear—Arnold Bax—and one or another piece of his symphonic music is fairly certain to gain place on the conductor's programmes. He likes, too, the vigor, the onrush, the eminently British quality of John Ireland."

Replacing Frederick Fradkin as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Richard Burgin, a native of Warsaw, who comes to this country with a record of continental achievement behind him and fame as concert master and soloist.

Mr. Burgin began his violin studies at the age of 5 with Lotti. Beginning in 1908 he went through four years of training under Leopold Auer at Petrograd, Jascha Heifetz being a fellow pupil. He then made a concert tour of Russia, Poland and Scandinavian countries, being soloist and concert master of the Petrograd Symphony Orchestra, the Stockholm Concert Society Orchestra, the Christian Philharmonic Society and the Helsingfors Symphony Orchestra. He was soloist in the first public performance of the violin concerto by Sibelius at the Stockholm Opera House, and played in the same work under the composer at Helsingfors. He has played also with Nikisch, Max Fiedler and Richard Strauss. He formed the Burgin Quartet in Stockholm, and also a quartet from the Philharmonic Society in Christiania, which went on tour for a number of seasons. His first public appearance was with the Philharmonic Orchestra of Warsaw. When a boy of 13 he lived for a few months in New York. He began his work with the Boston Symphony at the first rehearsal last week under Conductor Monteux.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now preparing for one of the busiest seasons in its history. Of the 110 concerts scheduled, ten will be given in Carnegie Hall as usual—on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, November 6 and 8, December 4 and 6, January 8 and 10, February 5 and 7 and March 18 and 20. Also, as usual, the seats for all concerts are engaged in advance, although any wishing to become applicants should write to W. H. Brennan, Symphony Hall, Boston. In other cities as well, for the season to come, all concerts are even now sold out by subscription.

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, is sparing no pains to make the pending season exceptional. In France during the past Summer he collected a large number of new scores—French, Italian and Russian—from which, with his reputation for making known new music of genius, much may be expected. He also bears in mind several American works of worth. He does not intend in any way to slight the classics, nor will he bar Wagner or any great music which the American public desires. In Boston rehearsals are now under way, for the initial concerts will take place there on October 10 and 11.

New Concert Master Burgin in His Place at First Rehearsal.

When Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, lifted his baton for the first rehearsal Friday in preparation for the opening of the season, Friday and Saturday, Oct. 7 and 8, Richard Burgin, the new concert master who arrived in Boston yesterday after a long voyage, sat in the usual place at the left of the conductor.

Although a native of Warsaw and of Polish parentage, Mr. Burgin's career has been largely confined, by the fortunes of war, to Russia, Finland and Scandinavia, winning a widespread fame as concert master in the large orchestras of each capital during the last 12 years.

He made his first acquaintance with the violin at the age of 5. His original teacher was Lotti, who, with Kreisler, was the fellow pupil of Massart, the great French teacher of the Wieniawski school. In 1902 he made his first public appearance as soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra in his native city.

Although he has heretofore known Boston only through the reputation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, America is not entirely strange to him, for at the age of 13 he spent some months in New York city, attracting considerable attention by his concerts in Carnegie Hall, and in the now vanished Mendelssohn Hall. At that time he listened to a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at one of its regular New York performances.

In 1908 he began four years of training under the great violin master, Leopold Auer, at Petrograd. Of the Auer pupils of long standing in America Zimbalist came just before his time, Seidel came later, while Jascha Heifetz was his fellow pupil and friend.

There followed (in 1912) a concert tour of Russia, Poland, Finland and Scandinavia. He played both as concert master and soloist with the Petrograd Symphony Orchestra, Helsingfors Symphony Orchestra, the Stockholm Concert Society Orchestra and the Christian Philharmonic Society. He played also notably as soloist in Petrograd, Kiev, Moscow, Odessa, Copenhagen and elsewhere. He played as soloist in Stockholm at the Stockholm Opera House in the first public performance of the violin concerto of Sibelius, and likewise at Helsingfors, the same work under the direction of the famous Finnish composer.

He has also played as concert master under Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch, former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, likewise, under Richard Strauss, and under Schneevoight, the Finnish conductor of the Philharmonic Society in Stockholm.

A very fine violinist who is also a cultured musician, has aspirations to play in a string quartette. Richard Burgin organized the "Burgin Quartette" in Stockholm. He likewise formed from the Philharmonic Society in Christiana a notable quartette, which played 12 concerts last season, touring from city to city. Mr. Burgin arrived on the Norwegian liner Bergensfjord, which sailed from Christiana.

When the 40th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened on Friday the orchestra was strengthened by the addition of valuable new members, chiefly in the string section. This season there are 10 double basses instead of eight and a new flute player replaces Charles de Mailly of former years.

According to accounts, the places of those members who deserted the orchestra last season have been easily filled and the audience on Friday was as enthusiastically appreciative as those of days before the symphony was subjected to its unfortunate experience. If the sale of tickets is a criterion of the affectionate regard that Bostonians entertain for their orchestra the new personnel of the orchestra will have hearty support during the winter.

The Boston musical season opened on Friday with the first of the winter's schedule of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. Providence has been slower in getting the machinery of music in motion, although practically all the clubs have a complete programme mapped out for the winter.

The season of Sunday recitals begins to-night with a joint programme to be given by Sig. Giuseppe Martino, baritone, and Miss Ethel Kenna, coloratura soprano, at Elks Auditorium at 8 o'clock. Miss Kenna was heard here last March in joint recital with Riccardo Stracciari at the Strand. Sig. Martino is from the Boston Conservatory of Music. Assisting the two principals will be Paul Vellucci, solo, pianist.

The programme follows: "Caro Nome" ("Rigoletto"), Verdi, Miss Kenna; "Zaza," Leoncavallo, Sig. Martino; "A Spirit Flower," Campbell-Tipton; "To a Messenger," La Forge; "The Little Damozel," Novello, Miss Kenna. "Fantasie Impromptu," Chopin, Mr. Vellucci. "Ideale," Tosti, Sig. Martino. New Concert Master Burgin in His Place at First Rehearsal.

When Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, lifted his baton for the first rehearsal Friday in preparation for the opening of the season, Friday and Saturday, Oct. 7 and 8, Richard Burgin, the new concert master who arrived in Boston yesterday after a long voyage, sat in the usual place at the left of the conductor.

Although a native of Warsaw and of Polish parentage, Mr. Burgin's career has been largely confined, by the fortunes of war, to Russia, Finland and Scandinavia, winning a widespread fame as concert master in the large orchestras of each capital during the last 12 years.

He made his first acquaintance with the violin at the age of 5. His original teacher was Lotti, who, with Kreisler, was the fellow pupil of Massart, the great French teacher of the Wieniawski School. In 1902 he made his first public appearance as soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra in his native city.

Although he has heretofore known Boston only through the reputation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, America is not entirely strange to him, for at the age of 13 he spent some months in New York city, attracting considerable attention by his concerts in Carnegie Hall, and in the now vanished Mendelssohn Hall. At that time he listened to a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in one of its regular New York performances.

In 1908 he began four years of training under the great violin master, Leopold Auer, at Petrograd. Of the Auer pupils of long standing in America Zimbalist came just before his time, Seidel came later, while Jascha Heifetz was his fellow pupil and friend.

There followed (in 1912) a concert tour of Russia, Poland, Finland and Scandinavia. He played both as concert master and soloist with the Petrograd Symphony Orchestra, Helsingfors Symphony Orchestra, the Stockholm Concert Society Orchestra and the Christian Philharmonic Society. He played also notably as soloist in Petrograd, Kiev, Moscow, Odessa, Copenhagen and elsewhere. He played as soloist in Stockholm at the Stockholm Opera House in the first public performance of the violin concerto of Sibelius, and likewise at Helsingfors, with the same work under the direction of the famous Finnish composer.

He has also played as concert master under Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch, former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, likewise, under Richard Strauss, and under Schneevoight, the Finnish conductor of the Philharmonic Society in Stockholm.

Every fine violinist who is also a cultured musician, has aspirations to play in a string quartette. Richard Burgin organized the "Burgin Quartette" in Stockholm. He likewise formed from the Philharmonic Society in Christiana a notable quartette, which played 12 concerts a season, touring from city to city.

Mr. Burgin arrived on the Norwegian liner, Bergensfjord, which sailed from Christiana.

The revised Boston Symphony Orchestra, with M. Monteux again at the helm, promises its usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts. The chief newcomer to the personnel is, of course, the concertmaster, Richard Burgin, a Polish pupil of Auer in the Heifetz days. As a boy of 12 Mr. Burgin gave recitals here, and he has since been concertmaster of various orchestras in Russia and Scandinavia. M. Monteux has been finding new scores in England, where the Bantock crows; in France, where the Ravel is a very Gallic bird, and among those bad, bold boys of Italy, Malipiero, Casella and Respighi.

When the 40th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened on Friday the orchestra was strengthened by the addition of valuable new members, chiefly in the string section. This season there are 10 double basses instead of eight and a new flute player replaces Charles de Mailly of former years.

According to accounts, the places of those members who deserted the orchestra last season have been easily filled and the audience on Friday was as enthusiastically appreciative as those of days before the symphony was subjected to its unfortunate experience. If the sale of tickets is a criterion of the affectionate regard that Bostonians entertain for their orchestra the new personnel of the orchestra will have hearty support during the winter.

The Boston musical season opened on Friday with the first of the winter's schedule of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. Providence has been slower in getting the machinery of music in motion, although practically all the clubs have a complete programme mapped out for the winter.

The season of Sunday recitals begins to-night with a joint programme to be given by Sig. Giuseppe Martino, baritone, and Miss Ethel Kenna, coloratura soprano, at Elks Auditorium at 8 o'clock. Miss Kenna was heard here last March in joint recital with Riccardo Stracciari at the Strand. Sig. Martino is from the Boston Conservatory of Music. Assisting the two principals will be Paul Vellucci, solo, pianist.

The programme follows: "Caro Nome" ("Rigoletto"), Verdi, Miss Kenna; "Zaza," Leoncavallo, Sig. Martino; "A Spirit Flower," Campbell-Tipton; "To a Messenger," La Forge; "The Little Damozel," Novello, Miss Kenna. "Fantasie Impromptu," Chopin, Mr. Vellucci. "Ideale," Tosti, Sig. Martino. Boston Symphony Concert Series to Open Here on Tuesday Evening, November 16

The approaching season of five Boston Symphony concerts in Infantry Hall will mark the share in Providence of the 40th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has figured prominently in the musical development of America for so many years. This series of concerts will held here on Tuesday evenings, November 16, December 14, January 25, March 8 and April 14.

The opening of the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 8 and it called forth the most enthusiastic praise both as regards quality of performance and the excellence of the personnel. Pierre Monteux, who became conductor of the orchestra last year will continue at his post. Spending a part of the past summer in England and France, Mr. Monteux discovered some highly interesting new works by the living composers of those countries and by the younger and bolder composers of Italy, Russia and Spain.

The five concerts in Providence will be made the more memorable this year by the appearance at each of notable singer or virtuoso. The soprano will be Alice Neilsen, one of the most talented and popular of American singers who since her triumphant season as prima donna of the now extinct Boston Opera Company, has made many notable appearances.

Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone, is also in the list and his many appearances in opera, oratorio and recitals of his own, and also as a soloist with this orchestra are well remebered. Felix Fox who played impressively with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston last year will be the only pianist.

Samuel Gardner, the young American violinist of highest talent who lived many years in Providence could not be more fittingly heard than as soloist with the great orchestra. The favorite pupil of Franz Kneisel and once a member of that eminent musician's quartet, he has since won a foremost place among violinists by his many recitals and appearances with orchestras.

Another violinist, Richard Burgin concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, is the only newcomer among the leaders of the various sections. Burgin, of Polish birth and Russian training has recently come from the Eastern part of Europe, where he was one of the most accomplished concertmasters.

Boston Symphony Statistics—Other Music.

The troublous times through which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has recently passed make the record of its season just closed of unusual interest and importance. Philip Hale, the brilliant dean of the Boston critics, concludes as follows his notice in the Boston Herald of last Saturday of the orchestra's final matinée:

In the weeks preceding the arrival of Mr. Rabaud Mr. Monteux formed practically a new orchestra. He brought it to so high a state of perfection that Mr. Rabaud found it a euphonious and plastic instrument to play upon.

In the course of this season, when suddenly another conductor might have lost heart, he again formed an orchestra and in a few weeks worked a miracle. The concerts of the last month have been worthy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the height of its reputation. Nor has Mr. Monteux shone only as a drill master. Throughout the season he has proved himself an interpreter of the very first rank. A glance at the review of the season, which will be published in the Herald to-morrow, will show the catholicity of his taste. As an interpreter no school, no period is foreign to him—Beethoven and Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Griffes, Handel and Berlioz—he understands them, he shares his understanding and appreciation with the audience. He has been dramatic, but not sensational; reverential, but not dull; poetic, but not sentimental. And throughout the season he has conducted himself as a modest, sincere gentleman; serious in his purpose, but not taking himself too seriously, for he has the saving grace of humor. Once asked if he was disturbed or upset by a wholly unforeseen and annoying occurrence, he smiled and said that he had been conductor of the Russian Ballet for several years.

Boston should be to-day as proud of its orchestra as at any time during its glorious past. It should also be proud of this orchestra's conductor. With him the future of the orchestra will be glorious.

Forty-nine composers were represented at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season that closed last night.

Beethoven, ten times; Wagner, eight; Debussy and Schumann, five each; Berlioz and Mozart, four; Brahms, Handel, Haydn, d'Indy, Mendelssohn, Schubert, three each; Bloch, Borodin, Dvorak, Franck, Liszt, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Saint-Saens, two each; while Albeniz, Bach, Balakireff, Converse, Frank Bridge, Carpenter, Chabrier, Chadwick, Charpentier, Chausson, Converse, Dukas, Duparc, Enesco, Gilbert, Glazounoff, Gluck, Grieg, Griffes, Goldmark, Lalo, MacDowell, Malipiero, Rabaud, Rachmaninoff, Ravel, Schmitt, Smetana, Stojowski, Stravinsky, Svendsen, Verdi, were each represented once.

The American composer cannot complain that he was ignored by Mr. Monteux: Carpenter, Chadwick, Converse, Gilbert, Griffes, MacDowell.

There were forty-seven performances of works by German-Austrian composers, with Liszt, the Hungarian, included.

There were twenty-three performances of works by French composers; ten of Russian compositions; six of American; two of Scandinavian; two of Italian; one of Spanish; two of Swiss.

We have not included Mr. Stojowski, who, born in Poland, has lived in the United States for at least fifteen years; while Enesco, a Roumanian by birth, is practically a Parisian.

selections.

The Boston Symphony series was of course the outstanding feature of the orchestral offerings. With it came Pierre Monteux, who followed Henri Rabaud as leader, and an "Americanized" ensemble. The Symphony had its troubles with disaffected members, but their secession did not seriously affect the concerts here. The loyal members and skilled recruits and the unassuming Mr. Monteux kept the programmes up to the standard and won large audiences and enthusiastic approval. Mr. Monteux proved himself a leader of force, imagination and dignity highly qualified to carry on the traditions of the organization.

The "classics" of enduring worth and favor will, of course, duly balance his programs. Rehearsals are now on the day for the opening of the season in Boston, which will take place on October 8 and 9. The series of concerts in Philadelphia will be the more interesting in that one of the foremost soloists of the time will assist each of them. Two sopranos are to be heard, each of whom has made a stir in the musical world.

Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster, recently arrived after a long voyage from Norway, is the only principal newly come to the orchestra this season. Burgin is a native of Warsaw, but his training has taken place largely in Russia, and the latter part of his career, owing to chaotic conditions in the East, was confined to Russia, Finland and Scandinavia. For 12 years he served as concertmaster in the fine orchestras which the larger cities of those countries possess. His first teacher was Lotti and his most famous teacher was Leopold Auer, with whom, at Petrograd, Burgin studied four years. Burgin toured Russia, Poland, Finland and Scandinavia with a great deal of success, playing as soloist in Petrograd, Kieff, Moscow, Odessa, Copenhagen and elsewhere. He has been concertmaster and soloist with the Petrograd Symphony Orchestra, the Helsingfors Symphony Orchestra, the Christiania Philharmonic Society and the Stockholm Concert Society. In Europe he has played as concertmaster under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Max Fiedler and Nikisch, likewise under Richard Strauss and Schneevoight, the Finnish conductor. He led a notable string quartet in Christiania and formed the Burgin Quartet in Stockholm, which toured from city to city giving 12 concerts each season.

Tickets by subscription are now on sale for the five concerts to be given in Philadelphia on the following Monday evenings: November 1, November 29, January 3, January 31 and March 14. MADE A NOTE OF

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a new concert master, in the person of Mr. Richard Burgin, who is a native of Warsaw, and is one of Leopold Auer's many successful pupils. Mr. Burgin, who comes here from Norway, has been soloist and concert-master at Petrograd, Helsingfors, Christiana and elsewhere, and has played under Nikisch, Max Fiedler and Richard Strauss. The Boston organization will give concerts, for which the subscription sale is now proceeding, on the Monday evenings of November 1, November 29, January 3, January 31 and March 14. Helen Stanley, Jean Bedetti, Alfred Cortot, Hulday Lushanska and Ernst Dohanyi will be the assisting artists successively upon these occasions.

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Present New Scores In This City.

Preparations are now under way for unusual events which will make the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a notable one. Five concerts are to be given in Washington at the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoons November 2 and 30, January 4, February 1 and March 15, with Helen Stanley, Jean Bedetti, Alfred Cortot, Hulda Lashanska and Erno Dohnanyi as soloists.

The season of "Pop Concerts" in Symphony Hall, the home of the orchestra in Boston, has been curtailed in order that full preparation might be undertaken. Pierre Monteux, the renowned conductor, discovered a number of highly interesting scores during his summer's stay in Europe, notably by the young Italian composers Respighi di Sabata, Malipiero and Cassella; by Darius Milhaund from France; and, of the Russians, Stravinsky, Vassilenko and Kalinnikoff. John Alden Carpenter and E. B. Hill will represent the native composers. Novelties will be duly balanced, however, by the great classics of enduring fame and popularity. Music.

Boston Symphony Statistics—Other Music.

The troublous times through which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has recently passed make the record of its season just closed of unusual interest and importance. Philip Hale, the brilliant dean of the Boston critics, concludes as follows his notice in the Boston Herald of last Saturday of the orchestra's final matinée:

In the weeks preceding the arrival of Mr. Rabaud Mr. Monteux formed practically a new orchestra. He brought it to so high a state of perfection that Mr. Rabaud found it a euphonious and plastic instrument to play upon.

In the course of this season, when suddenly another conductor might have lost heart, he again formed an orchestra and in a few weeks worked a miracle. The concerts of the last month have been worthy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the height of its reputation. Nor has Mr. Monteux shone only as a drill master. Throughout the season he has proved himself an interpreter of the very first rank. A glance at the review of the season, which will be published in the Herald to-morrow, will show the catholicity of his taste. As an interpreter no school, no period is foreign to him—Beethoven and Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Griffes, Handel and Berlioz—he understands them, he shares his understanding and appreciation with the audience. He has been dramatic, but not sensational; reverential, but not dull; poetic, but not sentimental. And throughout the season he has conducted himself as a modest, sincere gentleman; serious in his purpose, but not taking himself too seriously, for he has the saving grace of humor. Once asked if he was disturbed or upset by a wholly unforeseen and annoying occurrence, he smiled and said that he had been conductor of the Russian Ballet for several years.

Boston should be to-day as proud of its orchestra as at any time during its glorious past. It should also be proud of this orchestra's conductor. With him the future of the orchestra will be glorious.

Forty-nine composers were represented at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season that closed last night.

Beethoven, ten times; Wagner, eight; Debussy and Schumann, five each; Berlioz and Mozart, four; Brahms, Handel, Haydn, d'Indy, Mendelssohn, Schubert, three each; Bloch, Borodin, Dvorak, Franck, Liszt, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Saint-Saens, two each; while Albeniz, Bach, Balakireff, Converse, Frank Bridge, Carpenter, Chabrier, Chadwick, Charpentier, Chausson, Converse, Dukas, Dupare, Enesco, Gilbert, Glazounoff, Gluck, Grieg, Griffes, Goldmark, Lalo, MacDowell, Malipiero, Rabaud, Rachmaninoff, Ravel, Schmitt, Smetana, Stojowski, Stravinsky, Svendsen, Verdi, were each represented once.

The American composer cannot complain that he was ignored by Mr. Monteux: Carpenter, Chadwick, Converse, Gilbert, Griffes, MacDowell.

There were forty-seven performances of works by German-Austrian composers, with Liszt, the Hungarian, included

There were twenty-three performances of works by French composers; ten of Russian compositions; six of American; two of Scandinavian; two of Italian; one of Spanish; two of Swiss.

We have not included Mr. Stojowski, who, born in Poland, has lived in the United States for at least fifteen years; while Enesco, a Roumanian by birth, is practically a Parisian.

The Boston Symphony series was of course the outstanding feature of the orchestral offerings. With it came Pierre Monteux, who followed Henri Rabaud as leader, and an "Americanized" ensemble. The Symphony had its troubles with disaffected members, but their secession did not seriously affect the concerts here. The loyal members and skilled recruits and the unassuming Mr. Monteux kept the programmes up to the standard and won large audiences and enthusiastic approval. Mr. Monteux proved himself a leader of force, imagination and dignity highly qualified to carry on the traditions of the organization

Washington will have an interesting season of concerts beginning late in October. The usual courses will be given, including the Philharmonic, the Ten Star, and the Artists'. The three symphony orchestras, the Philadelphia, Boston and New York Symphony Society, will each give a series of four or five concerts. The Philharmonic course will open Wednesday afternoon, October 27, in Poli's Theater, when Anna Pavlowa, the famous Russian dancer, will give the program. The sixth season of the Ten Star series will open Friday afternoon, October 29, in the National Theater, and the Boston Symphony will open its series of five concerts Tuesday, November 2, in the National. Friday afternoon, November 12, in the National the Artists' course will open. In the Philharmonic and the Artists' courses are five concerts each, and ten in the Ten Star. Five concerts in each of the symphony series will give concert goers a busy season.

Mlle. Pavlowa will return to this country in October, after an extensive tour of South America and Europe, where she has just completed a long season at Drury Lane Theater in London.

—An eventful season is in store for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give a series of five concerts at the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 1, November 29, January 3, January 31 and March 14. Season tickets by subscription for this series of concerts, which have not been renewed by present patrons, will be placed on sale Monday, October 11. This will mark the fortieth anniversary of the orchestra which has taken such a historical place among musical institutions. Pierre Monteux, who made a notable impression last winter both by his sympathetic readings and demonstrative skill, will continue as the conductor. During his sojourn in England and France last summer he found some new scores, and he also brought back with him some of the daring music of younger Italy. The "classics" of enduring worth and favor will, of course, duly balance his programs. Rehearsals are now on the day for the opening of the season in Boston, which will take place on October 8 and 9. The series of concerts in Philadelphia will be the more interesting in that one of the foremost soloists of the time will assist each of them. Two sopranos are to be heard, each of whom has made a stir in the musical world.

Hulda Lashanska, a gifted young American singer, spent most of her life in New York, but she received the last touch to her art under the guidance of Mme. Sembrich. Helen Stanley was the "discovery" and admired prima donna of the Chicago Opera Company several seasons ago. Jean Bedetti, who came from Europe last season to lead the 'cello section of the Boston Orchestra had been solo 'cellist in leading orchestras of the old world. Two pianists of long established European reputation complete the list—Alfred Cortot and Noerno Dohnanyi, a Magyar musician of European fame, who is coming to this country for the first time since 1900, when, as a young man, he played notably with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore. He is better known to us as a composer of the first rank.

Brilliant Concert Season In Store For District Music Lovers

J. MacB.

The orchestra in Washington this winter! It means a feast for the music lover. Twenty-five orchestral concerts are announced, to be given by eight of the foremost orchestras of the world, one of which comes from Europe. The eight orchestras will offer nine famous conductors as follows:

Walter Damrosch, New York Symphony Society, ten concerts.

Pierre Monteux, Boston Symphony Orchestra, five concerts.

Leopold Stokowski, Philadelphia Orchestra, five concerts.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, "guest" conductor, for one concert of Philadelphia Orchestra series.

Toscanini, La Scala Orchestra, from Milan, Italy.

Josef Stransky, New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Eugen Ysaye, Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

Frederick Stock, Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

Sokoloff, Cleveland Symphony Orchestra.

There is a stir in music circles over the orchestral outlook. It breaks Washington's record—but then, in music, the record of the past is constantly being outreached.

NEWS OF THE ORCHESTRAS.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, under Walter Damrosch, dean of American conductors, has remained practically intact in its personnel for the past two seasons. During this time, it has rehearsed together more than 350 times, has given 209 public concerts, and has traveled more than 15,000 miles in the United States, Canada, France, Belgium, Italy, Holland and England.

At the close of last season, the entire organization of ninety-three members departed for Europe, making a tour of eighteen foreign [illegible]. The roster of the orchestra for concerts here next season is, with [illegible] two or three minor changes, identical in personnel with that which was heard last season in New York, London, Paris, Rome, Milan, Brussels and New Amsterdam.

In point of service among the first instruments, George Barrere, solo flute of the orchestra, heads the list with a record of fifteen years. Rene Pollain, first viola, and Willem Willeke, first cello, have each been with Mr. Damrosch for the past three years. Likewise, Gustave Tinlot, concertmaster, three years, while Arthur Lichstein, assistant concert master, and Morris Tivin, first bass, each has a record of five years. The tuba and tympanon, played respectively by Luca del Negro and Karl Glassman, four years. Other first instrument players who have been attached to the orchestra for two yars and will be in their customary places next season are: Louis Pabst, leading second violin; Pierre Mathieu, first oboe; Robert Lindemann, first clarinet; Louis Letellier, first bassoon; Santiago Richart, first horn, and Harry Blantz, first trumpet.

BOSTON'S FORTIETH YEAR.

Despite forebodings concerning the Boston Symphony Orchestra, due to both gossip and the secession of last March, the orchestra has been recruited again to full strength from thoroughly tested material. H. T. Parker in the Boston Transcript says:

"Those who may doubt have only to listen at the 'Pops' to the new flute player, for example, who succeeds Mr. de Mailly. Reluctant as the elderly are to believe it, the present infusion of young blood into the orchestra, especially in the string choirs, is much to its advantage."

Richard Burgin has just been announced as the new concert-master. A native of Warsaw and of Polish parentage, Mr. Burgin's training has taken place largely in Russia and his career has been chiefly in eastern Europe, in Russia, Finland, and Scandinavia, where he is considered the finest of concert masters, as well as a distinguished soloist. His most famous teacher is Leopold Auer, with whom he studied four years, a fellow-pupil and friend of Heifetz.

A quiet expedition to western Europe has yielded other recruits; various bands in the United States have also contributed them. As of old, the orchestra of 1920-21 will be a cosmopolitan body.

In Boston, the orchestra is just entering upon its fortieth year with better prospects than it has had since the days before the war. With fifty concerts "at home," it will give about fifty-five concerts in its monthly trips to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington.

THE PHILADELPHIANS.

Leopold Stokowski, after more than [illegible] months spent in England, [illegible] Austria, Switzerland, Belgium and Holland, returned the middle of September with a long list of novelties representing each of the countries he visited.

"There is one work by Ravel," he said in an interview in Musical America, "which interests me very much. I expect to present the new works of two other Frenchmen, Erik Satie and Roger Ducasse, the latter not to be confused with Dukas of 'Sorcerer's Apprentice' fame. I have new works, among the English composers, by Sir Edward Elgar, as well as Granville Bantock and Delius."

Mr. Stokowski has brought back two Schoenberg compositions, a German work by Braunfels, and an Austrian work by Schreker. There are, of course, Russian works and some of the new Italian school.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Music lovers hereabouts will doubtless be interested in the critical comments made on the first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season—for many have been the vicissitudes of that old and famous organization since the war began. There was a thought in many minds, for a time, that the orchestra might become of one nationality only, with a fair likelihood of that being French; and, with two French conductors, there seemed to be some ground for such thoughts. But the reports of the first concert of the present season show that the personnel of the orchestra now represents, as it always has represented, many nations. There are not only Frenchmen in the orchestra but Germans, Italians, Americans, Englishmen, a Hollander or two, a Greek, and even an Irishman among the others. Conductor Monteux and those responsible for the management of the orchestra apparently have not asked a man's nationality if his ability has been unquestioned.

The admirable Mr. Parker, music critic of the "Transcript," seems to strike a most reasonable note in his article on the first of the season's concerts in that he says that never, during the past few years, has the orchestra reached the heights claimed for it by its most strenuous defenders nor has it sunk to the depths to which its detractors gleefully condemned it. And Mr. Parker notes with very evident satisfaction that there is a younger looking Boston Symphony Orchestra this year than ever before. He says that there was "deadwood" among the older players that has now been done away with—another very reasonable and believable assertion—and he voices high expectations of the present organization under the able leadership of Mr. Monteux.

It would be idle here to quote extensively from the reviews of the first Boston concert by the largely new orchestra. It is enough that a strong and virile string tone is praised; that woodwinds and horns are called fine in quality; and brasses good; that the orchestra seemingly did its best at all times to follow the desires of the conductor (and this, it has been said, was not done by all the players at all times last season) and that a very fine spirit was shown in all the orchestra's work. Mr. Parker's "Transcript" praise was highest for the interpretation of Liszt's spectacular, sonorous and romantic symphonic poems, "Tasso"; and for the reading of the Beethoven Eighth Symphony he had little of good to say—evidently feeling that the conductor's touch was too heavy for Beethoven's lightest and cheeriest large work.

The Boston orchestra has a splendid place in the music of the world and it will please every lover of music in its highest forms to feel that, in its almost complete reorganization, the orchestra seemingly stands prepared to do its full share of fine performance and interpretation. A young orchestra made up of thoroughly capable players of all nationalities, under strong and competent leadership, with splendid traditions back of it and no limit to its future save that imposed by limitations that may be overcome as the organization becomes more thoroughly settled—such is the Boston Symphony Orchestra of today. The news is good news, for with no word against any of the great musical organizations of other cities, the Boston orchestra long has been—and we trust will long remain—one of the great institutions of America.

Conductor Monteux has plans in view both as regards new scores and long established masterpieces which promise to make the coming season one of the most interesting the orchestra has enjoyed.

The programs of the ten Symphony concerts to be played in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evenings, Nov. 4, Dec. 2, Jan. 6, Feb. 3 and March 17, and Saturday afternoons, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Feb. 5 and March 19, may they be expected fairly to represent the finest of orchestral music new and old.

During his sojourn in Europe last summer, Mr. Monteux discovered new scores by the Italians, Respighi, di Sabata, Casella and Malipiero; by the Frenchmen, Milhaud and Roger-Ducasse; by the Spaniard, de Falla. Particular works of high promise are two from England, Vaughan-Williams's "London Symphony," and Bantock's Symphony, "The Hebrides." From Russia, Vassilenko's "Epic Poem." American works to be heard are Mr. Hill's tone poem, "The Fall of the House of Ussher," and a symphonic version of Carpenter's "The Birthday of the Infanta," arranged by the composer himself. Some scores of the Finnish composer Sibelius will be revived, notably his First and Third Symphonies. The classical scores which Mr. Monteux has in mind are well known, with the exception of Schubert's little heard "Tragic Symphony"; Mozart's Overture to "The Seraglio," and two overlooked concertos of Bach to be played as ensemble pieces.

Brilliant Concert Season In Store For District Music Lovers

J. MacB.

The orchestra in Washington this winter! It means a feast for the music lover. Twenty-five orchestral concerts are announced, to be given by eight of the foremost orchestras of the world, one of which comes from Europe. The eight orchestras will offer nine famous conductors as follows:

Walter Damrosch, New York Symphony Society, ten concerts.

Pierre Monteux, Boston Symphony Orchestra, five concerts.

Leopold Stokowski, Philadelphia Orchestra, five concerts.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, "guest" conductor, for one concert of Philadelphia Orchestra series.

Toscanini, La Scala Orchestra, from Milan, Italy.

Josef Stransky, New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Eugen Ysaye, Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

Frederick Stock, Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

Sokoloff, Cleveland Symphony Orchestra.

There is a stir in music circles over the orchestral outlook. It breaks Washington's record—but then, in music, the record of the past is constantly being outreached.

NEWS OF THE ORCHESTRAS.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, under Walter Damrosch, dean of American conductors, has remained practically intact in its personnel for the past two seasons. During this time, it has rehearsed together more than 350 times, has given 209 public concerts, and has traveled more than 15,000 miles in the United States, Canada, France, Belgium, Italy, Holland and England.

At the close of last season, the entire organization of ninety-three members departed for Europe, making a tour of eighteen foreign cities. The roster of the orchestra for concerts here next season is, with but two or three minor changes, identical in personnel with that which was heard last season in New York, London, Paris, Rome, Milan, Brussels and New Amsterdam.

In point of service among the first instruments, George Barrere, solo flute of the orchestra, heads the list with a record of fifteen years. Rene Pollain, first viola, and Willem Willeke, first cello, have each been with Mr. Damrosch for the past three years. Likewise, Gustave Tinlot, concertmaster, three years, while Arthur Lichstein, assistant concert master, and Morris Tivin, first bass, each has a record of five years. The tuba and tympanon, played respectively by Luca del Negro and Karl Glassman, four years. Other first instrument players who have been attached to the orchestra for two yars and will be in their customary places next season are: Louis Pabst, leading second violin; Pierre Mathieu, first oboe; Robert Lindemann, first clarinet; Louis Letellier, first bassoon; Santiago Richart, first horn, and Harry Blantz, first trumpet.

BOSTON'S FORTIETH YEAR.

Despite forebodings concerning the Boston Symphony Orchestra, due to both gossip and the secession of last March, the orchestra has been recruited again to full strength from thoroughly tested material. H. T. Parker in the Boston Transcript says:

"Those who may doubt have only to listen at the 'Pops' to the new flute player, for example, who succeeds Mr. de Mailly. Reluctant as the elderly are to believe it, the present infusion of young blood into the orchestra, especially in the string choirs, is much to its advantage."

Richard Burgin has just been announced as the new concert-master. A native of Warsaw and of Polish parentage, Mr. Burgin's training has taken place largely in Russia and his career has been chiefly in eastern Europe, in Russia, Finland, and Scandinavia, where he is considered the finest of concert masters, as well as a distinguished soloist. His most famous teacher is Leopold Auer, with whom he studied four years, a fellow-pupil and friend of Heifetz.

A quiet expedition to western Europe has yielded other recruits; various bands in the United States have also contributed them. As of old, the orchestra of 1920-21 will be a cosmopolitan body.

In Boston, the orchestra is just entering upon its fortieth year with better prospects than it has had since the days before the war. With fifty concerts "at home," it will give about fifty-five concerts in its monthly trips to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington.

THE PHILADELPHIANS.

Leopold Stokowski, after more than three months spent in England, France, Austria, Switzerland, Belgium and Holland, returned the middle of September with a long list of novelties representing each of the countries he visited.

"There is one work by Ravel," he said in an interview in Musical America, "which interests me very much. I expect to present the new works of two other Frenchmen, Erik Satie and Roger Ducasse, the latter not to be confused with Dukas of Sorcerer's Apprentice' fame. Wide Range for the Symphony Concerts ext Season—The Classics in Due Place nd With Sundry Rediscoveries—Young nglishmen, "New" Italians, a Risen paniard, Promising Parisians, Fresh ussians, in Novel Music A-Plenty—ood Share for Americans as Well

THE present conductor of the Symphony Orchestra respects its tradition of widely ranging programmes. In the days when the ewing of scornful epithets upon any and Germans was a favorite pastime, it e the custom to call his predecessors rrow-minded. Perhaps they were; yet m the first years of Mr. Gericke through final years of Dr. Muck, they set and intained a precedent: The repertory st be catholic. Whether a piece of sic came from French, German, Czech, lian, Scandinavian, Russian or Amer- n pen, whether it was classic or semi- ssic, modern or ultra-modern, it de- ved performance, so long as it was im- ssive, interesting or otherwise signifi- t. As presumption went, the public the Symphony Concerts was no less n-minded, becomingly curious, as well, ut newer and innovating composers. conductors persisted; audiences usually ved worthy of their good name; and fine tradition was established, unex- ed in any orchestra at home or abroad.

Monteux, as the scope of his pro- mmes last season proved, received and ishes it. Personally, moreover, he has cosmopolitan outlook; his eagerness for el and interesting music is unabating; eads new and old scores unceasingly; is diligent in the exploration of pub- ers' shelves; he likes nothing better to upturn an overlooked piece by a ic or a semi-classic composer, to open way to an unknown and deserving . In fine, he would make the Sym- y Concerts a mirror of the music of immediate time no less than a glass re- ing the classics in living image. For Monteux, music is music, according ntrinsic desert, whatever the national- of the composer, whatever the date the sheets. Modestly and wisely, he ts it the obligation of a conductor eek tactful contacts with composers publishers rather than to hold them ing on his door-step. With these ends iew he journeyed to London and Paris summer; while annually he purposes enew these European visits.

In Boston and in other , they pleasured the public, main- d the standards of the orchestra, won just laurels, heartened the youth of ges to whom the new and strange is fearsome thing. In his second season, ning next month, he intends to make epertory yet more various and stim- g, so far as twenty-four programmes him room and there is time and energy horough preparation. Daily he is at studies in the conductor's room at phony Hall; soon he will be at the y work of rehearsals and concerts, without haste and without rest.

There will be room for the rising ard, de Falla, and for the risen Pa- , Milhaud and Roger-Ducasse. Mu- one of the younger Russians, Vas- o, will be played for the first times in ica. An-unheard symphony—his third ibelius, the Finn, is in prospect, along the suite for the concert-hall that arpenter has assembled from his bal- "The Birthday of The Infanta," and tone-poem by Mr. Hill, suggested 's grewsome tale, "The Fall of The of Ussher." From the classics, e, Mr. Monteux is minded to re- er to his hearers at Symphony Hall rt's "Tragic Symphony," by way iation from the endlessly repeated ished" and Ninth; the gay overture art's opera, "Il Seraglio" and his to "Don Juan"; and two over- concertos of Bach to be played as le pieces—one with violin, flute and for outstanding instruments and one e organ in like place.

The aspect and the those wild islands in the North kindled the composer to the mu- melodic material he has drawn islanders' folk-tunes. To one of ngest and most individual of Eng- posers Mr. Monteux has also given old Bax—and one or another piece mphonic music is fairly certain to on the conductor's programmes. too, the vigor, the onrush, the British quality of John Ireland. tral scores by four of the "new" composers now lie upon Mr. Mon- k—Respighi, di Sabata, Malipiero la. The piece by Respighi is in erbiage a "tone-picture" of four miliar fountains of Rome. It has ady played in America by Mr. chestra in Chicago and, if mem- by Mr. Damrosch's in New York. Sabata's music is a suite of poetized sights and sounds in the country. From Malipiero, whom Mr. Monteux encountered and liked last June in Paris, he has received the two parts of the "Impressioni dal Vero," each in three divisions and again "tone-picturing" in the composer's highly imaginative fashion. One set at least of these "Impressioni" will be played at the Symphony Concerts next winter and after Malipiero's "Pause del Silenzio" of two successive seasons, anticipation warms to them. By common consent Casella is vivid and pungent master of harmonic and instrumental means. He loves, too, a large fervor of expression, a red fire of movement. It has lately pleased him to score for full orchestra, utilized to the utmost, Balakirev's glowing, fantastic piano-piece, "Islamey." It will make vivid, sonorous end to one of the conductor's pending programmes. Another piece, altogether Casella's own, also awaits his hand, "The Convent by the Water," suite, if recollection does not slip, from a highly fanciful piece of the theatre.

Little by little a younger generation of Spaniards, almost wholly unknown to American ears, has made way into the concerts of Paris and London. Of one of them, Turina, Mr. Monteux thinks but poorly. Another, de Falla, he appraises highly. Accordingly, the public of the Symphony Concerts is to hear an orchestral suite from his pen for which his songs, as sung hereabouts by Mme. Gauthier or Miss Janacopulos, raise expectation.

The younger Parisian to whom Mr. Monteux inclines for promise become performance, is Darius Milhaud, barely known in America by a quartet for strings occasionally played by "The Flonzaleys." He has written not a little music that sounds merely eccentric; he also wrote recently a suite abounding in fancy and charm. As soon as it is played at the Colonne Concerts, next winter, in Paris, the score will be sent to Boston. Little known here is the music of Roger-Ducasse, one of the elder Parisian youngsters so to say. The conductor has in hand what he counts the most characteristic example of it—a tone-poem of spring. His fellow-conductor, Monsieur Pierné has provided him with another novel piece—a prelude to "The Cathedrals," poem of French fortitude and French glory when war assailed these shrines. Once upon a time Bernhardt brought it to the stage and Pierné provided the music. In degree and in unhackneyed pieces, the elder French composers will also have their turn on Mr. Monteux's programmes—Debussy, for example, with "The Sea"; d'Indy with "A Summer Day on the Mountain"; Franck with the tone-poem, "The Djinns," in which a piano bears considerable part, and a transcription from piano to orchestra of the Prelude, Choral and Fugue, made likewise by Monsieur Pierné.

Vassilenko is the younger Russian chosen for place among the conductor's rising composers and the piece in his "Epic Poem," mediæval in suggestion, utilizing the liturgical music of his country. Kalinnikov, an older Russian composer, who has occasionally figured upon programmes in America, has also provided a symphony new to Bostonian ears. To Stravinsky Mr. Monteux, after their long collaboration with Mr. Diaghilev's ballet, instinctively turns. From "Petrushka"—the mimodrama of puppets at a Russian fair, seen and heard of old in Boston—the composer once drew a suite for the concert-hall. The conductor believes he can reproduce it. And the music of Rimsky-Korsakov is by no means exhausted. Upon Mr. Monteux's music-rack is the overture to his opera, "A Night in May;" accessible in New York is the suite chosen and sewn together from another opera, "The Tale of Tsar Saltan" in the composer's rich vein of fantastic legend. Near neighbor to these Russians, as the land, though hardly the spirit, goes, is the Finn, Sibelius none of whose music has lately been heard at the Symphony Concerts, persistently as Mr. Fiedler and Dr. Muck gave it vogue. Both overlooked his third symphony. Mr. Monteux will undertake it. The clanging and familiar first also tempts the conductor.

And the Americans to whom Mr. Monteux has long lent a receptive ear? Two of their pieces for which he waits have already been specified—Mr. Carpenter's ballet-suite and Mr. Hill's tone-poem. Add to these, if a performance can be arranged, Mr. Arthur Shepherd's concerto for piano and orchestra, a much-praised music among his fellow composers; a revival of Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and of Mr. Carpenter's gay feat of ingenuity and humor, "Adventures in A Perambulator"; certain extremely modern "sketches"—no more than six minutes long—by an obscure New Yorker, discovered by Mr. Monteux; and a deserved repetition of the late Mr. Griffes's "Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan," and the more imaginative American voices will not go unheard at Symphony Hall through the winter.

To complete the circle the Germans. From them the classics—Bach and Mozart as already recited; Beethoven in at least two symphonies and sundry miscellaneous pieces; the symphony of Schubert aforesaid, another from Schumann; the fourth symphony of Brahms; the usual modicum of Wagner in the concert-room. Finally, hope of Strauss in the finer-fibred tone-poems. Mr. Monteux does not lack admiration or zest for them. Like the rest of us, he is curious to discover how lapse of years and change of taste have affected impression from them and pleasure in them. He is well aware that other conductors purpose to bring them back to American concert-halls. From their fortunes and from the public of the Symphony Concerts in Boston he awaits a cue. As a cosmopolitan musician, he is [illegible] for Strauss; as a Franco-American conductor, he would also be discreet.

Into a Fortieth Year of Symphony Concerts

The Usual Schedule at Home and Abroad, an Orchestra in Full Strength, Promising Programmes, Prospective Soloists

TEN years hence the Symphony Orchestra, half a century old, will enter upon its fiftieth season. As it is the American way to catch at anniversaries, no doubt the occasion will be duly celebrated. Meanwhile the band is beginning, this autumn, a fortieth year with better prospects at home than it has known since the days before the late war. As of old, every seat on the floor and in the lower balcony for the concerts of Friday afternoons has been taken by subscription made in the spring or the summer. Presumably every place in the upper gallery could be as readily sold to subscribers. In fact, the present trustees of the orchestra have been counselled so to sell them and thereby increase revenues in a needy hour. They prefer, however, to follow ancient custom, opening this second balcony on Friday afternoons to all comers at twenty-five cents per head . To do so has been the way of the orchestra "from the earliest times." That it should continue in such course pleases many who help to meet the annual deficits. Possibly those that now swarm into these "rush-seats" would find the Symphony Concerts otherwise beyond their means. However that may be, their favorite places will again be open to them on the familiar terms—not only next season, but probably through many seasons to come.

So do the concerts of Friday afternoon keep vogue; so do many, whose incomes have been harshly reduced in the economic unbalance of the day, willingly pay the mounting price for them. There are pleasures from symphonic music and the Symphony Orchestra not lightly to be resigned. There are quiet loyalties and years of habit. Some curiously prefer afternoon to evening, especially if that evening be Saturday, in concert-going. Suburbia finds journeying to music more agreeable by day than by night. It is ancient and honorable belief that the matinées at Symphony Hall possess a certain social cachet. At the least our faithful Jenkinses weekly record "those present"—and sometimes forget to check up their standing lists.

None the less, the concerts of Saturday evenings have individuality. As the signs go, the more expert and exacting with music and the performance of music choose them; while the newer public for the orchestra—the sustaining public, maybe, of that fiftieth year—finds at them room and welcome. Again as the signs go, that desirable public is increasing. For, though there are still untaken places in appreciable number for the pending concerts of Saturday, the sum of subscriptions to them is already larger than it has been since Dr. Muck's time. Would a shift of these evening concerts, say to Thursdays, please the public? Some believe that it would in these years of passionate "week-ending" and as passionate pursuit of the theatres on the last day of the week. Yet such a change would upset the viable routine of rehearsals; while the regained subscriptions for Saturday evenings hardly encourage it. So it is that between Oct. 8 and 9 of 1920 and the end of April, 1921, the Symphony Orchestra [illegible] pairs of concerts without departure from routine, but with clearly bettered prospects.

Abroad

These fifty concerts at home—since the two "extras" for the Pension Fund belong within the schedule—are but half the work of the orchestra for the new year. As usual the remaining fifty-odd will be distributed among many cities. The series at Cambridge, at last with the increased prices long warranted by quality and costs, at Providence, at Worcester, will run familiar course. In spite of the risen charges for travel—and for a band a hundred strong—the occasional visits to other cities of New England, north and south, will be continued and multiplied. Abstractly they are an obligation to the region that sustains the orchestra; concretely they are also profitable to the treasury.

To New York and Brooklyn, to Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, the band will go as usual in monthly journeys from November through March. Needless, almost, to say, the cost of these "trips" will rise by thousands of dollars. On the other hand, neither the trials and tribulations of the orchestra in recent years nor the high place that Mr. Stokowski and his forces have gained in four of the five cities, has materially lessened an assured and expectant public. From New York to Washington subscriptions for the new season stand virtually as they have stood for many seasons past. More: these journeys to other eastern capitals of music, this playing before other audiences than those of Symphony Hall, tend to keep conductor and men to their mettle, are an essential part, at home and abroad, of the prestige of the band. Therefore they continue.

Per contra, the annual expedition westward to various cities of the Middle States has been abandoned for the time. The new cost of travel, the recurring strain upon the orchestra both counted against it. Thereby will come more time and energy for fresh and interesting undertakings at home—for, say, the concerts to young people well begun last winter or the renewal of the Symphony Chorus to share with the band the performance of large choral pieces. For Mr. Monteux and all concerned in the ordering of the new season are as ambitious as they are diligent.

A Full Orchestra

Despite superfluous forebodings—the forebodings in particular that the gossip of New York likes to fondle—the Symphony Orchestra has been recruited again to full strength from thoroughly tested and thoroughly promising material. Those who may doubt have only to listen at The Pops to the new flute-player, for example, who succeeds Mr. de Mailly. In the solo-part of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Hindoo Song" on Thursday evening, technical ease, brightness and warmth of tone, quick sense of melodic contour and intensity alike commended him. Strange as it may seem in sundry quarters, there are able and desirable orchestral musicians quite willing to forsake the precious Union for work at Symphony Hall. Reluctant as the elderly are to believe it, the present infusion of young blood into the orchestra, especially in the string-choirs, is much to its advantage. Before the secession of last March, it was on the way to look—and sometimes to be—as middle-aged as its audiences. Mr. Monteux has been patient in the quest and exacting in the sifting of new men. Mr. Jacchia and others have aided him. Before long a new concert-master will have crossed the sea who, until he sits in his place, must be nameless. A quiet expedition to western Europe has yielded other recruits; various bands in the United States have also contributed them. As of old, the orchestra of 1920-21 will be a cosmopolitan body.

It remains for Mr. Monteux, when he sets to rehearsals and concerts at the beginning of October, to fuse these forces new and old, to assimilate them to a pliant and sensitive routine, to make them responsive instruments to music, to each other, to him. How skilful and stimulating, ambitious and tireless he is in such a task, he proved last spring when he upbuilt the orchestra from the confusion into which the seccession plunged it, and so did it a service that none other conductor from Henschel through Rabaud had excelled. Now calmer days, ampler time, an alert and tranquil "personnel," a freer opportunity generally, await him to remove the inevitable scars. To the utmost of his abilities, to the height of his fine standards, he will do so.

Prospective Programmes

Similarly in the choice of programmes Mr. Monteux will enjoy a freer range than was his lot last season. Le bonhomme Rabaud may have been highly "spiritual;" but he was not exactly widely read or widely curious in symphonic music. He was a provincial of Paris, quite content with what he had heard there, quite persuaded that the narrow routine of Messieurs Chevillard and Pierné was the beginning and the end of programme-making. Hence he traversed the more frequent and more eloquent symphonies of Beethoven; chose his other "classics" by like rule o' thumb; had his inning with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" and "Antar"—the patois of "artists' rooms" calls them "sure-fire stuff"; laid quick hand upon the "old-reliables" of modern French music like Chabrier's "España" and Dukas's tale of the wetted sorcerer. By long-standing precedent of the Symphony Concerts, biennial performance at most is the portion of these pieces. Therefore Mr. Monteux might repeat none of them last season. This year they will be at his disposal to the amplifying of his programmes on the classic and the semi-classic side, in interesting revelation of his way with "battle-horses" of the concert-hall.

Mr. Monteux, however, is widely read, curious and ambitious with symphonic music. Contrary to present Parisian habit, he is a true cosmopolitan among conductors. He has accepted whole-heartedly the fine tradition of the catholicity of the Symphony Concerts. He is laudably eager to make known the new work of new men. The rising generation of Italians, preferring symphonic to operatic music, interests him, and he has pieces by Malipiero, Respighi and, possibly, Tommasini, in mind for prospective programmes. He has turned a kindly eye upon the younger Englishmen, indecently overlooked in American concert-halls, and from them, as report runs, he has chosen for performance Vaughan Williams's renowned "London Symphony" and other promising music. In France last summer, the composers who have succeeded to Debussy and Ravel as innovating individualists, properly attracted him, and the public of Symphony Hall will listen next winter to Milhaud and, maybe, some of his brethren.

With characteristic discrimination, Mr. Monteux sets store by the two most individual American composers—Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Carpenter. Each has written a symphony, too long unrepeated since Boston first heard it. Before long also, Mr. Carpenter will have drawn a Suite for the concert-hall from his ballet, "The Birthday of The Infanta." Wherever he is, Mr. Monteux does not forego his explorations. Now that he is in town again, he is at his daily studies in the library of Symphony Hall. There, it is said, he is traversing the symphonies of Sibelius, with an eye to possible performance of the baffling fourth or the clanging second. By this time, too, he can hardly overlook the well-filled shelf labeled R. Strauss. How well "Don Juan" or "Til Eulenspiegel" or "Don Quixote" would suit Mr. Monteux's abilities! Only those resolved to fight the late war through their natural lives and, doubtless, into the next world as well, can raise malevolent and altogether non-musical objection to these acknowledged masterpieces. Strauss will have place on Mr. Bodanzky's programmes in New York this season, upon Mr. Toscanini's in New York and Boston, both; probably on Mr. Stock's and Mr. Stokowski's as well. Is there a valid reason why his music should not be restored to the Symphony Concerts? There is a public hungry for it.

"Assisting Artists"

So much for orchestra and programmes. There are also "soloists"—a baker's dozen of them, if Messrs. Maier and Pattison in a concerto for two pianos are to be counted as a twain that is one flesh and the new concert-master added to the advertised list. Except Mr. Bauer and Mr. Levitzki among the pianists and Mr. Thibaud of the three violinists, not one has previously been heard in the regular course of the Symphony Concerts. Except Mr. Bauer and Mr. Thibaud again, with Miss Nielsen now added among the singers, every one is of the newer generation in American concert-halls. For the most part, thus, an inning of youth, vexing perhaps to the elders accustomed to jog complaisantly through a round of "old favorites," but an inning also of well-tested and well-established youth. Run down the list, the rather superabundant list, of pianists. Mr. Bauer, of course, and especially in his chosen piece, the first concerto of Brahms, needs no bush. Grant him, even, to the "old-timers." But of the deservedly risen youth are Mr. Levitzki, heard first at the Symphony Concerts and loudly applauded in the autumn of 1917; Mr. Grainger, a vivid personality of the concert-hall, if ever there was such, an individualist through and through, a poseur, if the detractor likes, but an interesting poseur; Mr. Rubinstein, the virtuoso in excelsis, the musician pur sang, who lives, moves and has his being in his piano and the pieces he plays upon it; Messrs. Maier and Pattison, bringing into Symphony Hall for the first time in recent years music for two pianos, and a merit therein stretching from Boston to Paris. Not quite so young in years is Mr. Moiseiwitsch, the Anglo-Russian, but he was newcomer to America last season and then and there sealed himself as meet companion for symphony orchestras.

So, also, with the violinists, too few rather than too many, and the singers. Mr. Thibaud is in Mr. Bauer's happy case, an established master even in the days of Kreisler, Ysaye and Heifetz, a musician no less than a violinist of rarely fine and rarely personal fibre. Miss Menges is youth again—and youth that has struck its fire of temperament from London as far east as Dresden, as far west as New York.

Possibly the singers, Mr. Werrenrath and Miss Lashanska aside, are a more questionable list. Over him the most sceptical need have no scruple. Time and again in Boston, in concerts of his own, in concerts of choral music, he has given proof of a musical intelligence, an artistic honesty, a range and mastery of vocal means, a penetrating and projecting imagination that set him high in his generation. He has served the Symphony Orchestra in various choral concerts; timely, he is now to companion it in regular course. In Miss Lashanska, in turn, young ability has ripened into a rich young prime. If she has been more extolled by private report than public performance, that report, for once, seems not to mislead. As for the other two, Miss Nielsen seemed last spring to have renewed and refined qualities of voice and song that for a while mischance and mistake clouded. She is destined for music of Mozart and of old she sang it artfully and charmingly. At her ambitious best and her artistic ease, Mme. Stanley may also prove worthy of a place in the Symphony Concerts.

So run the decorations of the new season at Symphony Hall. For the most part they promise to be pleasing ornaments, grave or gay. Yet accessories they remain to an orchestra that may reasonably anticipate a year of untroubled recovery and firm-set progress and to a conductor whose quality, on many sides and however it may be finally judged, has flowered in signal service.

Changes Coming in Symphony Personnel

By E. F. HARKINS.

CHANGES in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, resulting from the "walkout" that occurred last Spring, have been made. They will include, presumably, a new concert master to take the place of Fredric Fradkin. It is more than likely that Mr. Monteux secured this new right-hand man when he went to Paris this Summer. The management will have an announcement to make on this subject before long. It will also announce later the additions to the list of soloists published in last Sunday's Advertiser.

The original list furnishes a striking indication of the liberal policy of offering encouragement to the younger virtuosi of the day. With few exceptions, the soloists will be new-comers at the Symphony concerts. Lashanska, Mosciwitsch, Levitski, Stanley, Grainger, Menges, Werrenrath, Maier, Pattison—these names represent conspicuously the younger element among the musical stars. Alice Neilsen, Harold Bauer and Jacques Thibaud are more familiar figures. And with few exceptions the soloists are Americans or persons of foreign birth now pretty well Americanized. This, too, is a commendable move on the part of the Symphony management. It will stimulate musical art in the United States.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is fundamentally a great educational institution. It has always been deemed a rare honor to appear as soloist with the orchestra, and who, pray, better deserves such honors than the young native artists. In recent years the opera companies have, with admirable enterprise, engaged many American singers, among them Miss Lashanska, Miss Stanley and Mr. Werrenwrath. The "Aida" performance given at Braves Field the first of this month was primarily a magnificent illustration of the rise of the American singer. Every one of the four principal singers was a native of this country and worthy of appearance on the most ceelbrated stages.

The Symphony Orchestra is rendering most commendable service to music in the United States by including so many American artists among the soloists secured for the coming season.

* * *

So far as orchestras are concerned, the outstanding novelty of the approaching musical year will be the visit of Arturo Toscanini and his Italian organization. Toscanini, who formerly conducted at the Metropolitan Opera House, was mentioned in connection with the Boston Symphony leadership when Muck was sent to Atlanta to mull over the Kaiser's fatal ambition. However, the distinguished Italian could not then be induced to leave his native land, which was deep in the throes of war. His American tour will be a musical event of the most impressive order, judging by the brilliant success he made at the Metropolitan. It is expected that he will bring his orchestra to Symphony Hall in December.

* * *

On October 10, at Symphony Hall, Tom Burke, the new Irish tenor, will make his first appearance in Boston. Burke was born in England of Irish parentage. He made a triumphal debut at Covent Garden, London, last year with Mme. Melba in "Boheme."

Never has the public manifested a keener interest than in the coming season. All seats for the Friday afternoon concerts have been taken by subscription and only a few for Saturdays are still available. A number of special plans are being entertained for as many events of unusual musical importance as the schedule will permit. There will be several young people's concerts, following the successful experiment of last year.

Mr. Monteux, during his Summer's trip to Europe, has found some new scores of high talent which will figure on the coming programs. Of the younger Italian composers, Respighi di Sabata, Malipiero and Cassella will be represented, and from Spain, deFalla. From France, Darius Milhaud, the young artistic revolutionist, and, of the older generation, Roger Ducasse, Pierne, Dubussy, Franck. An excerpt from a new work of d'Indy, "The Legend of St. Christopher," and a new battle piece by Saint Saens for organ and orchestra, "Cypres et Lauriers," will be heard.

In the solo-part of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Hindoo Song" on Thursday evening, technical ease, brightness and warmth of tone, quick sense of melodic contour and intensity alike commended him. Strange as it may seem in sundry quarters, there are able and desirable orchestral musicians quite willing to forsake the precious Union for work at Symphony Hall. Reluctant as the elderly are to believe it, the present infusion of young blood into the orchestra, especially in the string-choirs, is much to its advantage. Before the secession of last March, it was on the way to look—and sometimes to be—as middle-aged as its audiences. Mr. Monteux has been patient in the quest and exacting in the sifting of new men. Mr. Jacchia and others have aided him. Before long a new concert-master will have crossed the sea who, until he sits in his place, must be nameless. A quiet expedition to western Europe has yielded other recruits; various bands in the United States have also contributed them. As of old, the orchestra of 1920-21 will be a cosmopolitan body.

It remains for Mr. Monteux, when he sets to rehearsals and concerts at the beginning of October, to fuse these forces new and old, to assimilate them to a pliant and sensitive routine, to make them responsive instruments to music, to each other, to him. How skilful and stimulating, ambitious and tireless he is in such a task, he proved last spring when he upbuilt the orchestra from the confusion into which the seccession plunged it, and so did it a service that none other conductor from Henschel through Rabaud had excelled. Now calmer days, ampler time, an alert and tranquil "personnel," a freer opportunity generally, await him to remove the inevitable scars. To the utmost of his abilities, to the height of his fine standards, he will do so.

Prospective Programmes

Similarly in the choice of programmes Mr. Monteux will enjoy a freer range than was his lot last season. Le bonhomme Rabaud may have been highly "spiritual;" but he was not exactly widely read or widely curious in symphonic music. He was a provincial of Paris, quite content with what he had heard there, quite persuaded that the narrow routine of Messieurs Chevillard and Pierné was the beginning and the end of programme-making. Hence he traversed the more frequent and more eloquent symphonies of Beethoven; chose his other "classics" by like rule o' thumb; had his inning with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" and "Antar"—the patois of "artists' rooms" calls them "sure-fire stuff"; laid quick hand upon the "old-reliables" of modern French music like Chabrier's "España" and Dukas's tale of the wetted sorcerer. By long-standing precedent of the Symphony Concerts, biennial performance at most is the portion of these pieces. Therefore Mr. Monteux might repeat none of them last season. This year they will be at his disposal to the amplifying of his programmes on the classic and the semi-classic side, in interesting revelation of his way with "battle-horses" of the concert-hall.

Mr. Monteux, however, is widely read, curious and ambitious with symphonic music. Contrary to present Parisian habit, he is a true cosmopolitan among conductors. He has accepted whole-heartedly the fine tradition of the catholicity of the Symphony Concerts. He is laudably eager to make known the new work of new men. The rising generation of Italians, preferring symphonic to operatic music, interests him, and he has pieces by Malipiero, Respighi and, possibly, Tommasini, in mind for prospective programmes. He has turned a kindly eye upon the younger Englishmen, indecently overlooked in American concert-halls, and from them, as report runs, he has chosen for performance Vaughan Williams's renowned "London Symphony" and other promising music. In France last summer, the composers who have succeeded to Debussy and Ravel as innovating individualists, properly attracted him, and the public of Symphony Hall will listen next winter to Milhaud and, maybe, some of his brethren.

With characteristic discrimination, Mr. Monteux sets store by the two most individual American composers—Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Carpenter. Each has written a symphony, too long unrepeated since Boston first heard it. Before long also, Mr. Carpenter will have drawn a Suite for the concert-hall from his ballet, "The Birthday of The Infanta." Wherever he is, Mr. Monteux does not forego his explorations. Now that he is in town again, he is at his daily studies in the library of Symphony Hall. There, it is said, he is traversing the symphonies of Sibelius, with an eye to possible performance of the baffling fourth or the clanging second. By this time, too, he can hardly overlook the well-filled shelf labeled R. Strauss. How well "Don Juan" or "Til Eulenspiegel" or "Don Quixote" would suit Mr. Monteux's abilities! Only those resolved to fight the late war through their natural lives and, doubtless, into the next world as well, can raise malevolent and altogether non-musical objection to these acknowledged masterpieces. Strauss will have place on Mr. Bodanzky's programmes in New York this season, upon Mr. Toscanini's in New York and Boston, both; probably on Mr. Stock's and Mr. Stokowski's as well. Is there a valid reason why his music should not be restored to the Symphony Concerts? There is a public hungry for it.

"Assisting Artists"

So much for orchestra and programmes. There are also "soloists"—a baker's dozen of them, if Messrs. Maier and Pattison in a concerto for two pianos are to be counted as a twain that is one flesh and the new concert-master added to the advertised list. Except Mr. Bauer and Mr. Levitzki among the pianists and Mr. Thibaud of the three violinists, not one has previously been heard in the regular course of the Symphony Concerts. Except Mr. Bauer and Mr. Thibaud again, with Miss Nielsen now added among the singers, every one is of the newer generation in American concert-halls. For the most part, thus, an inning of youth, vexing perhaps to the elders accustomed to jog complaisantly through a round of "old favorites," but an inning also of well-tested and well-established youth. Run down the list, the rather superabundant list, of pianists. Mr. Bauer, of course, and especially in his chosen piece, the first concerto of Brahms, needs no bush. Grant him, even, to the "old-timers." But of the deservedly risen youth are Mr. Levitzki, heard first at the Symphony Concerts and loudly applauded in the autumn of 1917; Mr. Grainger, a vivid personality of the concert-hall, if ever there was such, an individualist through and through, a poseur, if the detractor likes, but an interesting poseur; Mr. Rubinstein, the virtuoso in excelsis, the musician pur sang, who lives, moves and has his being in his piano and the pieces he plays upon it; Messrs. Maier and Pattison, bringing into Symphony Hall for the first time in recent years music for two pianos, and a merit therein stretching from Boston to Paris. Not quite so young in years is Mr. Moiseiwitsch, the Anglo-Russian, but he was newcomer to America last season and then and there sealed himself as meet companion for symphony orchestras.

So, also, with the violinists, too few rather than too many, and the singers. Mr. Thibaud is in Mr. Bauer's happy case, an established master even in the days of Kreisler, Ysaye and Heifetz, a musician no less than a violinist of rarely fine and rarely personal fibre. Miss Menges is youth again—and youth that has struck its fire of temperament from London as far east as Dresden, as far west as New York.

Possibly the singers, Mr. Werrenrath and Miss Lashanska aside, are a more questionable list. Over him the most sceptical need have no scruple. Time and again in Boston, in concerts of his own, in concerts of choral music, he has given proof of a musical intelligence, an artistic honesty, a range and mastery of vocal means, a penetrating and projecting imagination that set him high in his generation. He has served the Symphony Orchestra in various choral concerts; timely, he is now to companion it in regular course. In Miss Lashanska, in turn, young ability has ripened into a rich young prime. If she has been more extolled by private report than public performance, that report, for once, seems not to mislead. As for the other two, Miss Nielsen seemed last spring to have renewed and refined qualities of voice and song that for a while mischance and mistake clouded. She is destined for music of Mozart and of old she sang it artfully and charmingly. At her ambitious best and her artistic ease, Mme. Stanley may also prove worthy of a place in the Symphony Concerts.

So run the decorations of the new season at Symphony Hall. For the most part they promise to be pleasing ornaments, grave or gay. Yet accessories they remain to an orchestra that may reasonably anticipate a year of untroubled recovery and firm-set progress and to a conductor whose quality, on many sides and however it may be finally judged, has flowered in signal service.

SYMPHONY PLANS FOR SEASON

The fortieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will find the Boston Symphony Orchestra with full ranks, and in better playing condition than at any time since the war disrupted its ranks. Its losses, due to the strike last spring, have been insignificant, and the new men in almost every case are as good or better than those who went out. So Manager Brennan declares, and he announces the soloists for the coming season for the first time today. They are as follows:

Pianists, Harold Bauer, Benno Moiseiwitsch, Percy Grainger, Mischa Levitzka, Arthur Rubenstein and Guy Maier and Lee Pattison in numbers for two pianos.

The violinists will include Jacques Thibaud and Isolde Menges.

The singers include Alice Nielsen, Helen Stanley, Hulda Lashanska and Reinald Werrenrath.

Judging from the subscription, attendance at the concerts this season will be the best for several years. Pierre Monteux, the conductor, remains two seasons more in Boston. He has recently returned from France and has brought back a number of novel and interesting scores.

Changes Coming in Symphony Personnel

By E. F. HARKINS.

CHANGES in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, resulting from the "walkout" that occurred last Spring, have been made. They will include, presumably, a new concert master to take the place of Fredric Fradkin. It is more than likely that Mr. Monteux secured this new right-hand man when he went to Paris this Summer. The management will have an announcement to make on this subject before long. It will also announce later the additions to the list of soloists published in last Sunday's Advertiser.

The original list furnishes a striking indication of the liberal policy of offering encouragement to the younger virtuosi of the day. With few exceptions, the soloists will be new-comers at the Symphony concerts. Lashanska, Mosciwitsch, Levitski, Stanley, Grainger, Menges, Werrenrath, Maier, Pattison—these names represent conspicuously the younger element among the musical stars. Alice Neilsen, Harold Bauer and Jacques Thibaud are more familiar figures. And with few exceptions the soloists are Americans or persons of foreign birth now pretty well Americanized. This, too, is a commendable move on the part of the Symphony management. It will stimulate musical art in the United States.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is fundamentally a great educational insttution. It has always been deemed a rare honor to appear as soloist with the orchestra, and who, pray, better deserves such honors than the young native artists. In recent years the opera companies have, with admirable enterprise, engaged many American singers, among them Miss Lashanska, Miss Stanley and Mr. Werrenwrath. The "Aida" performance given at Braves Field the first of this month was primarily a magnificent illustration of the rise of the American singer. Every one of the four principal singers was a native of this country and worthy of appearance on the most ceelbrated stages.

The Symphony Orchestra is rendering most commendable service to music in the United States by including so many American artists among the soloists secured for the coming season.

* * *

So far as orchestras are concerned, the outstanding novelty of the approaching musical year will be the visit of Arturo Toscanini and his Italian organization. Toscanini, who formerly conducted at the Metropolitan Opera House, was mentioned in connection with the Boston Symphony leadership when Muck was sent to Atlanta to mull over the Kaiser's fatal ambition. However, the distinguished Italian could not then be induced to leave his native land, which was deep in the throes of war. His American tour will be a musical event of the most impressive order, judging by the brilliant success he made at the Metropolitan. It is expected that he will bring his orchestra to Symphony Hall in December.

* * *

On October 10, at Symphony Hall, Tom Burke, the new Irish tenor, will make his first appearance in Boston. Burke was born in England of Irish parentage. He made a triumphal debut at Covent Garden, London, last year with Mme. Melba in "Boheme."

Never has the public manifested a keener interest than in the coming season. All seats for the Friday afternoon concerts have been taken by subscription and only a few for Saturdays are still available. A number of special plans are being entertained for as many events of unusual musical importance as the schedule will permit. There will be several young people's concerts, following the successful experiment of last year.

Mr. Monteux, during his Summer's trip to Europe, has found some new scores of high talent which will figure on the coming programs. Of the younger Italian composers, Respighi di Sabata, Malipiero and Cassella will be represented, and from Spain, deFalla. From France, Darius Milhaud, the young artistic revolutionist, and, of the older generation, Roger Ducasse, Pierne, Dubussy, Franck. An excerpt from a new work of d'Indy, "The Legend of St. Christopher," and a new battle piece by Saint Saens for organ and orchestra, "Cypres et Lauriers," will be heard.

Symphony Orchestra's New List of Soloists Has None of Last Year's Names

Three Debutantes With the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Hulda Lashanska, the soprano, who has won a place for herself among the younger American singers, and Isolde Menges, the English violinist, much liked in Europe, appear for the first times in Boston with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this winter. Mme. Alice Nielsen, a former Boston Opera soprano, will sing for the first time with the Symphony Orchestra.

By J. V. CLARK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra management have an innovation for the concerts of the coming season, plans for which are announced today. The management has engaged no soloist for the coming season who appeared with the orchestra last year. By this plan the regular patrons of the orchestra will have a list of soloists, some making their debuts with the orchestra, some old favorites who appeared prior to last year.

The pianists are in the ascendency among the soloists for this winter. First and foremost is Benno Moiseiwitsch, who has played here once in recital creating something of a sensation. He will make his debut as an orchestral player here with our orchestra. Mischa Levitzki and Arthur Rubinstein, two of the younger Russian pianists, will also appear. Levitzki ran away with the honors in the recital given by four prominent pianists last winter, Mr. Rubinstein did not bear out his reputation at that one Boston appearance. He will have another opportunity to bid for Bostonian favors.

Percy Grainger, the blonde khaki-clad pianist of other days, will return in civilian clothes. He has a multitude of admirers, especially among the fair sex. Messrs. Guy Maier and Lee Pattison will appear in a double piano concerto. Of the older pianists Harold Bauer is alone found in the lists.

Among the singers chief interest centers in Miss Hulda Lashanska, whose warm, rich, vivid voice, and whose personal beauty made her a favorite in New York. She has to build up her following here—presumably an easy task. Other singers to appear are Miss Alice Nielsen, remembered pleasantly from old Boston opera days; Miss Helen Stanley, a stand-by at the Chicago opera, and Reinald Werrenrath, the popular young baritone.

A newcomer violinist, Isolde Menges, the Englishwoman, and an older favorite, Jacques Thibaud, who delights the connoisseurs and who fails to create a large popular clientele, will be the only soloists among the strings. No members of the orchestra have been invited to appear as soloists.

Again Mr. Monteux will be the conductor. In Europe last summer he found some interesting scores among the new music, which he will use to color his programs.

The sponsors of the orchestra stated that the financial prospects for this coming 40th season of the orchestra are extremely bright. All seats for the 24 Friday afternoon concerts have been taken and only a few for the 24 Saturday evening concerts remain.

Probably during the year there will be concerts for school children, as were inaugurated last winter. The great success of the Pops, now in progress, lead many well-wishers of the orchestra to hope that during the season the orchestra may give some similar entertainments, for if Pops are pleasant entertainment and profitable, too, in spring, summer and fall, there is every reason to believe that they would be equally delightful and lucrative in winter.

Special Plans for Boston Symphony Season

Never has the public manifested a keener interest than in the coming season of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts which will begin October 8 and 9 in Symphony Hall. All seats for the Friday afternoon concerts have been taken by subscription and only a few for Saturdays are still available. A number of special plans are being entertained for as many events of unusual musical importance as the schedule (already crowded) will permit.

There will certainly be given at least a number of Young People's Concerts following the successful experiment of last year. These concerts will enlist the full orchestra and be conducted by Pierre Monteux. They will enable the younger generation of Boston to hear music of direct appeal, but also of high character, and in the finest possible performance.

Mr. Monteux, during his summer's trip to Europe, has found some new scores of high talent which will figure on the coming programmes. Of the younger Italian composers, Respighi di Sabata, Halpiero and Cassella will be represented, and from Spain, deFalla. From France Darius Milhaud, the young artistic revolutionist, and of the older generation, Roger Ducasse, Pierne, Dubussy, Franck. An excerpt from a new work of d'Indy, "The Legend of St. Christopher," and a new battle piece by Saint-Saens for organ and orchestra, "Cypres et Lauriers," will be heard. Of the younger Russians, Stravinsky and Vassilenko, and of the older Russians, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Kalinnikoff.

Mr. Monteux will also revive works of Sibelius whose music has not been heard here for several seasons. Among native composers there will be Mr. John L. Carpenter and Mr. E. G. Hill. The great classics of enduring fame will, however, have their due place at the Symphony concerts. Bach, Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Shubert and Schumann will be duly represented, as well

Of the pianists to appear Sergei Rachmaninoff, Joseph Hoffmann and Benno Moiseivitsch are prominent.

At still other concerts Madame Luiza Tetrazzini will return to Boston, also Eugene Ysaye, the Belgian violinist, the Isadore Duncan Dancers and Anna Pavlova, the famous dancer of another school, with her brilliant company and large orchestra. The usual pension fund concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will also take place on Sunday afternoons.

Four oratories are to be sung by the Handel and Haydn Society: Handel's "Messiah" on Dec. 19 and 20, Sullivan's "Golden Legend" on Jan. 23, Verdi's "Requiem" Feb. 20, and Horatio Parker's "Hora Novissima" March 27. Notable soloists at these concerts are Inez Barbour, Nevada. VanDerVeer, Morgan, Kingston, Clarence Whitehill, Marie Rappold, Lambert Murphy, Royal Dadmun, Florence Hinkle, Merle Alcock, Reinald Werrenrath, Edward Johnson, Caroline Hudson-Alexander, Louise Homer, Orville Harrold and others who will be announced later.

The usual illustrated travel lectures will be given on Friday evenings and Saturday afternoons, 10 by E. M. Newman and 10 by Burton Holmes. For further information regarding these concerts and lectures, all who are interested are invited to apply to the management, Symphony Hall.

Brilliant Soloists for Coming Symphony Concerts

BY OLIN DOWNES

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts take place in Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, and Saturday evening, Oct. 9. With these concerts may be said to occur the formal opening of the Boston musical season. Last season the public's support of these concerts was as remarkable as it was encouraging to a management just emerging from conditions incidental to war, and face to face with the next serious question of its relations with striking players and the musical union. These unfortunate episodes seem now to be of the past. They have not disrupted the orchestra. That they have not affected the confidence of its patrons and their enthusiasm for the concerts is shown by the fact that the subscriptions for the coming season are in all probability the heaviest in the history of the Boston Symphony.

There are no more seats, save the 525 "rush" seats which sell at a quarter each, for the Friday afternoon concerts. All the seats that can be purchased by subscription, that is, all the other seats in the hall save those of the second balcony, have been taken. With the exception of a very few seats remaining the entire house has been sold for the Saturday night concerts, which makes it quite certain that with the sale of single seats through the season, if any are left by the time of the opening, full houses will greet every local appearance of the orchestra.

To meet this exceptional enthusiasm of the public, Mr. Monteux, who spent weeks in France and England during the summer, has brought back with him an uncommonly interesting list of new works to be heard, some of them by composers new to Boston, has scheduled several important American compositions and has balanced the modernity of these compositions by standard works of the repertory.

The Soloists

Most of the soloists are new to Boston Symphony audiences. The list, consisting mainly of young artists, of proven and brilliant gifts, is solidifed by such names as Bauer and Grainger, pianists, Thibaud, violinist, Alice Nielsen, Reinal Warren, singers.

Benno Moisievitch, a new arrival at these concerts, is one of the most gifted young pianists of the day, intellectual, poetic, an individual interpreter and a past master of his instrument, as his recital given last season in Symphony Hall showed.

Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, Boston artists, whose two-piano recitals were conspicuous features of last winter's concerts, as of the concert world of London and Paris when these young men played together during the time of their work for the Red Cross during the war, will make a richly deserved appearance. Mischa Levitski, a brillaint player, a young man who made an excellent impression when he played at the Boston Symphony concerts in 1918, will reappear. Arthur Rubinstein, a celebrated young Russian virtuoso, was expected to appear with the orchestra last season, but was prevented by an accident of travel. His recital at an Ampico concert in Symphony Hall, however, showed his quality as an artist.

Isolde Menges, an English girl of 26, a personality as well as a virtuoso, is an Auer pupil. Successes in Europe, and, last season, in New York, have been responsible for her engagement.

Helen Stanley, soprano, has been heard here in recital, but not with the orchestra. She is an American singer of uncommon talent.

Hulda Laschanska, who has been known in Boston by means of graphphone records, is a pupil of Marcella Sembrich, and made a remarkably successful debut in concert in New York two years ago. She is comely, the wife of a man of means, a serious artist not because of financial necessity but because of her passion for her work. Mr. Werrenrath is today in the front rank of the singers of the younger generation.

SYMPHONY TO BEGIN REHEARSING

Rehearsals will be undertaken this week by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the opening concerts of the season, a week from next Friday and Saturday, October 8 and 9.

Of the coming 40th season of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts by the great orchestra, much may be expected. Public enthusiasm and confidence has been clearly expressed in the unprecedented sale of seats by subscription—only a few for Saturday nights remain untaken.

In addition to the regular series, some special concerts on a large scale are being planned, and also a number of young people's concerts with regular conductor and full orchestra, thus further developing the experiment so successfully made last winter.

Benno Moisievitch, a new arrival at these concerts, is one of the most gifted young pianists of the day, intellectual, poetic, an individual interpreter and a past master of his instrument, as his recital given last season in Symphony Hall showed.

Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, Boston artists, whose two-piano recitals were conspicuous features of last winter's concerts, as of the concert world of London and Paris when these young men played together during the time of their work for the Red Cross during the war, will make a richly deserved appearance. Mischa Levitski, a brillaint player, a young man who made an excellent impression when he played at the Boston Symphony concerts in 1918, will reappear. Arthur Rubinstein, a celebrated young Russian virtuoso, was expected to appear with the orchestra last season, but was prevented by an accident of travel. His recital at an Ampico concert in Symphony Hall, however, showed his quality as an artist.

Miss Hulda Lashanska, (insert) Benno Moiseiwitsch and Arthur Rubinstein

Isolde Menges, an English girl of 26, a personality as well as a virtuoso, is an Auer pupil. Successes in Europe, and, last season, in New York, have been responsible for her engagement.

Helen Stanley, soprano, has been heard here in recital, but not with the orchestra. She is an American singer of uncommon talent.

Hulda Laschanska, who has been known in Boston by means of graphphone records, is a pupil of Marcella Sembrich, and made a remarkably successful debut in concert in New York two years ago. She is comely, the wife of a man of means, a serious artist not because of financial necessity but because of her passion for her work. Mr. Werrenrath is today in the front rank of the singers of the younger generation.

SYMPHONY TO BEGIN REHEARSING

Rehearsals will be undertaken this week by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the opening concerts of the season, a week from next Friday and Saturday, October 8 and 9.

Of the coming 40th season of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts by the great orchestra, much may be expected. Public enthusiasm and confidence has been clearly expressed in the unprecedented sale of seats by subscription—only a few for Saturday nights remain untaken.

In addition to the regular series, some special concerts on a large scale are being planned, and also a number of young people's concerts with regular conductor and full orchestra, thus further developing the experiment so successfully made last winter.

SYMPHONY SEASON TO START NEXT WEEK

Rehearsals will be undertaken this week by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the opening concerts of the season, a week from next Friday and Saturday, October 8 and 9. Of the coming fortieth season of twenty-four Friday afternoon and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts by the famous orchestra, much may be expected. NEW SOLOISTS FOR SYMPHONY

Many Popular Artists to Appear During the Coming Season

Never before has the sale of seats by subscription for the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall progressed so rapidly as in the present Summer. All seats for the twenty-four Friday afternoon concerts have been taken and only a few for the twenty-four Saturday evening concerts are still available.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, whose efforts were a prime reason for the great success of the concerts last season, will continue at the post of honor. In Europe this Summer a diligent search has rewarded this pioneer of the younger and bolder music, with some highly interesting scores, the most promising of which will find their place on his programs.

The soloists for the coming season will comprise an entirely new list from those of 1919-20.

Benno Moiseiwitsch, pianist, has long been admired in London and other European cities. He made a splendid impression here last season in recital. Percy Grainger, the pianist from Australia, has long been a favorite with Boston audiences. Mischa Levitzki, Russian pianist, will make his second appearance with the orchestra. Arthur Rubinstein, another noted pianist from Russia, is among the newcomers. An innovation at these concerts will be a double piano concerto played by Guy Maier and Lee Pattison. Jacques Thibaud, the master violinist of France, and Harold Bauer are well-known visitors. Isolde Menges, the young English violinist, has never been heard in Boston, but her reputation more than justifies her engagement.

Among singers, Alice Nielsen will be fondly recalled by those who remember the days when the Boston Opera Company was in its prime. What Miss Nielsen was to the Boston Opera Company, so is Madame Helen Stanley to the Chicago Opera Company. Another soprano who is to sing with the orchestra for the first time is Madame Hulda Lashanska, a particular favorite among the younger singers. Reinald Werrenrath, the young American baritone, is also one of the soloists.

SOLOISTS OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

It is evidence of the popularity of the Symphony concerts with their regular patrons that all seats for the coming Friday afternoon series have already been taken by subscription, and only a few seats for the Saturday evening concerts are still available.

The series of concerts in 1920-21 will commemorate the 40th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There will be 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts as usual, beginning Oct 8-9 and extending through the following April.

Pierre Monteux, whose direction of the orchestra has been so successful, will continue in this post of honor. Spending a good part of the Summer in England and France, he has brought back some new scores of much promise from each of these countries, and some music of the younger Italian school, as well. The so-called classics, of course, will constitute the backbone of his programs.

The soloists will include a wide range of famous artists. Among the pianists is Harold Bauer, one of the greatest now living. Perhaps no musician has played oftener with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Another pianist who will create interest is Benno Moiseiwitsch. Coming to this country for the first time last Winter, he was immediately proclaimed in New York as the "discovery" of the season.

The popularity of Percy Grainger's "Shepherd's Hey" and "County Derry" is exceeded only by its composer's marvelously light-fingered touch as a pianist, and the poetry of his readings. That this artist has never played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra before may be attributed to the chances of bookings and conflicting dates.

Guy Meier and Lee Pattison have succeeded in creating fresh general interest in music for two pianos. By playing a double concerto they will be making a precedent at these concerts.

Mischa Levitzki, who is generally ranked in the forefront of the rising generation of pianists, played with the orchestra here in 1918.

Arthur Rubinstein is new to the orchestra but not to Boston. He crossed the seas some years ago when a mere boy, and astounded those who heard him by his lightning dexterity.

Another artist who will come to Boston with a very considerable European and also a New York reputation is Isolde Menges, the young English violinist. Making her debut in London in February, 1913, she played again and again with different orchestras and in recitals, always with the same brilliant success.

A violinist more familiar to our musical public is Jacques Thibaud. The electric emotional intensity of his playing is well known.

Among singers, Alice Neilson will be fondly recalled by those who remember the days when the Boston Opera Company was in its prime and proclaimed her as its star soprano.

What Miss Neilsen was to the Boston Opera Company so is Mme Helen Stanley to the Chicago Opera Company. It will be her first appearance with the Boston Orchestra.

Another dramatic soprano is Mme Hulda Lashanska, a particular favorite among the younger singers.

The single man singer among the lists of soloists is Reinald Werrenrath. Although this young American baritone has sung in opera, his greatest success has been on the concert stage.

Special Plans for Boston Symphony Season

Never has the public manifested a keener interest than in the coming season of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts which will begin October 8 and 9 in Symphony Hall. All seats for the Friday afternoon concerts have been taken by subscription and only a few for Saturdays are still available. A number of special plans are being entertained for as many events of unusual musical importance as the schedule (already crowded) will permit.

There will certainly be given at least a number of Young People's Concerts following the successful experiment of last year. These concerts will enlist the full orchestra and be conducted by Pierre Monteux. They will enable the younger generation of Boston to hear music of direct appeal, but also of high character, and in the finest possible performance.

Mr. Monteux, during his summer's trip to Europe, has found some new scores of high talent which will figure on the coming programmes. Of the younger Italian composers, Respighi di Sabata, Halipiero and Cassella will be represented, and from Spain, deFalla. From France Darius Milhaud, the young artistic revolutionist, and of the older generation, Roger Ducasse, Pierne, Dubussy, Franck. An excerpt from a new work of d'Indy, "The Legend of St. Christopher," and a new battle piece by Saint-Saens for organ and orchestra, "Cypres et Lauriers," will be heard. Of the younger Russians, Stravinsky and Vassilenko, and of the older Russians, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Kalinnikoff.

Mr. Monteux will also revive works of Sibelius whose music has not been heard here for several seasons. Among native composers there will be Mr. John L. Carpenter and Mr. E. G. Hill. The great classics of enduring fame will, however, have their due place at the Symphony concerts. Bach, Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Shubert and Schumann will be duly represented, as well as Liszt and Wagner.

SUNDAY AND OTHER CONCERTS AT SYMPHONY HALL

A Wide Range of Orchestras, Singers, Pianists and Violinists — Dancers as Well—Additions to Mr. Monteux's Programme—Mr. Rabaud, Director of the Conservatory at Paris—From Europe Mr. Stokowski Brings "Novelties" and Opinions—Hard-Working Mr. Stock—The Wagners to Resign Baireuth—Items and Incidents

ONCE more comes preliminary announcement of the annual series of Sunday Concerts at Symphony Hall and once more it follows familiar lines. As usual the concerts will begin in the afternoon at half-past three, from the first Sunday in October through the last Sunday in April. According to recent custom the Symphony Orchestra will provide two for the increase of its Pension Fund; while the Händel and Haydn Society will contribute four divided between as many choral pieces—"The Messiah," Sullivan's "Golden Legend," Verdi's Requiem Mass and Parker's "Hora Novissima." The remaining twenty-odd concerts will fall to singers, in vogue with the miscellaneous audiences of the first day of the week and to singers, violinists and pianists likewise sought by those who discriminate in the pleasures of music. Within the first group are Mme. Schumann-Heink (on Oct. 3), Mme. Galli-Curci, Mme. Gluck, Titta Ruffo of the Chicago Opera Company, Mr. Rosenblatt, the Jewish cantor; and, though he is violinist, Mr. Kubelik of delicately spun tone and gossamer feats of technical skill, about to revisit the United States after many years of absence. In the second group stand three notable pianists—Mr. Rakhmaninov to be heard more than once, Mr. Hofmann after he returns from his present journey to England and Mr. Moiseiwitsch, the applauded newcomer of last year; Mr. Zimbalist, the fine-fibred violinist; Mme. Hempel, Mme. Homer, Mr. Werrenrath and Mr. Edward Johnson (of the Chicago Opera) for singers. As usual the progress of the season will lengthen and diversify this list; but two familiars are necessarily missing from it—Mr. Heifetz, the violinist, soon to depart for a year in Europe, and Mr. McCormack, the singer, busy with a journey that will nearly span the world.

On other afternoons and evenings of the week quite as interesting concerts as this Sunday series will also take place at Symphony Hall. Thus, Mr. Kreisler, the violinist, will be heard at two or three Saturday matinées; Mme. Farrar will return—inimitable in the concert-room; Mr. Charles Hackett, the able light tenor of the Metropolitan Opera House, will sing for the first time in Boston since his days of pupillage; Mme Tetrazzini will take final leave of her Bostonian public; Mr. Ysaye will reappear as violinist; and Messrs. Bauer, Thibaud and Casals will join voices in a concert of chamber-music for piano, violin and violoncello. Of old Paris and London used so to hear these three. Next winter, for the first times in America, they are to appear together. Three orchestras, as already announced, are also to be expected at Symphony Hall—Mr. Toscanini's from Italy, Mr. Stock's from Chicago and Mr. Sokolov's from Cleveland. Finally, the Harvard Glee Club has taken the hall for three concerts of the choral music in which Dr. Davison has carried it so high, with Mr. Kreisler, Mr. Spalding and Mme. Hempel as "assisting artists."

Here in Boston

Two pieces new to Boston and likely to be heard at the Symphony-Concerts in the course of the season were overlooked in the forecast of Mr. Monteux's programmes recently printed in this place—"The Quest of God," an orchestral interlude in d'Indy's new music-drama, "The Legend of St. Christopher," and "Cypress and Laurels," by Saint-Saëns, who, like other old men, cannot part with the late war. Mr. Monteux, by the way, is not of those who believe "St. Christopher" equally adapted to performance in concert-hall or opera house. The one and only place for it, in his view, is the theatre.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

VISITING CONDUCTORS BOSTON SHOULD HEAR

Mr. Mengelberg, Mr. Coates and Their Deserts with the Symphony Orchestra—The Berkshire Festival Begins—Strauss's "Don Quixote" in 1920—The Piano of the Future—Incidents and Opinions

TWO European conductors of distinction will visit New York next winter—Willem Mengelberg, the leader of the Amsterdam Orchestra, and Albert Coates, the leader of the London Symphony Orchestra and, occasionally, in opera at Covent Garden. Mr. Mengelberg will come at the beginning of January for a stay of three or four months, dividing with Mr. Bodanzky the concerts of the National Symphony Orchestra in New York and a few neighboring cities, and journeying at least once to Philadelphia as "guest-conductor" over Mr. Stokowski's orchestra. Comparatively Mr. Coates's visit will be brief. In December he will spend a fortnight or more in New York, conducting with Mr. Damrosch's orchestra in three concerts, two of which will fall to the music of British composers. As arrangements stand at present, Mr. Coates will go to no other city.

By common consent Mr. Mengelberg ranks high in his profession, applauded in his native Holland, in adjacent Germany, and most of all in Paris. Whenever he went thither before the war, he was extolled, and the cautious Mr. Rabaud—a Frenchman of the French—so admired him as to recommend him to the trustees of the Boston Orchestra as the ablest conductor within reach. Mr. Mengelberg's energy is inexhaustible; journeying has become second nature to him; he is a quick, but exacting drill-master; he has the classic and the modern repertory at fingers' ends; he is a conductor of both individuality and power. Mr. Coates, in turn, is younger and of less far-reaching and established renown. He was highly reputed in Russia, where he began and continued his career until the disorders of the revolution compelled him to migrate. He then settled in London where he has rapidly made his way to distinction. He is a conductor of original mind, warm temperament and communicating force alike to orchestra and audience. He excels in particular in romantic pieces and in the music of our own time. He has cultivated the younger Russians and the younger Britons.

Mr. Mengelberg's reputation long since spread to Boston. When possible conductors for the Symphony Orchestra have been canvassed, he has stood high among them. There is genuine curiosity here to know and judge him at first hand. Why, then, should he not be asked to lead in a pair of Symphony Concerts or, in a concert for the Pension Fund or, at the least, in a concert of his own with the Symphony Orchestra? Every European conductor of high rank knows the quality and the prestige of the band and is keen to try his hand upon it. Since Mr. Mengelberg is to be "guest-conductor" in Philadelphia, he is seemingly free, under his contract with the National Orchestra, to be "guest-conductor" elsewhere. It is long since he crossed the Atlantic to lead the Philharmonic Society of New York in two pairs of concerts; it may be as long before he again—if ever—recrosses the sea. He deserves to be heard in Boston; an eager audience would welcome him; the authorities of the Symphony Orchestra owe an invitation to a conductor of his rank. These are not the hard and fast Higginsonian days with precedents and all that sort of thing; while Mr. Monteux, man of the world as well as notable conductor, seems too courteous and broad-minded not to add his invitation to that of trustees or orchestra.

If Mr. Mengelberg, why not also Mr. Coates? If it is pleasure and profit for us in Boston to hear established European conductors, we are the gainers also when we listen to the rising men. For the first times in years the music of the younger British composers will be deservedly heard at the Symphony Concerts. By the same token a young and distinguished British conductor might also be heard with the Symphony Orchestra, no less desirably, no less pleasurably. In reason, courtesy and just deserts Mr. Coates might be called to a pair of Symphony Concerts or to a concert of his own—sure to flower in novel music as well as novel abilities. The prestige of Boston as a capital of music in America needs stimulating. The less there is of routine at the Symphony Concerts and with the Symphony Orchestra, the more interesting they both become. It will be a pity if, in their own city and with their own orchestra, Bostonians may not hear Mr. Mengelberg and Mr. Coates. To ignore them altogether is to be as parochial as the old gentleman at the club-window.

There is genuine curiosity here to know and judge him at first hand. Why, then, should he not be asked to lead in a pair of Symphony Concerts or, in a concert for the Pension Fund or, at the least, in a concert of his own with the Symphony Orchestra? Every European conductor of high rank knows the quality and the prestige of the band and is keen to try his hand upon it. Since Mr. Mengelberg is to be "guest-conduetor" in Philadelphia, he is seemingly free, under his contract with the National Orchestra, to be "guest-conductor" elsewhere. It is long since he crossed the Atlantic to lead the Philharmonic Society of New York in two pairs of concerts; it may be as long before he again—if ever—recrosses the sea. He deserves to be heard in Boston; an eager audience would welcome him; the authorities of the Symphony Orchestra owe an invitation to a conductor of his rank. These are not the hard and fast Higginsonian days with precedents and all that sort of thing; while Mr. Monteux, man of the world as well as notable conductor, seems too courteous and broad-minded not to add his invitation to that of trustees or orchestra.

If Mr. Mengelberg, why not also Mr. Coates? If it is pleasure and profit for us in Boston to hear established European conductors, we are the gainers also when we listen to the rising men. For the first times in years the music of the younger British composers will be deservedly heard at the Symphony Concerts. By the same token a young and distinguished British conductor might also be heard with the Symphony Orchestra, no less desirably, no less pleasurably. In reason, courtesy and just deserts Mr. Coates might be called to a pair of Symphony Concerts or to a concert of his own—sure to flower in novel music as well as novel abilities. The prestige of Boston as a capital of music in America needs stimulating. The less there is of routine at the Symphony Concerts and with the Symphony Orchestra, the more interesting they both become. It will be a pity if, in their own city and with their own orchestra, Bostonians may not hear Mr. Mengelberg and Mr. Coates. To ignore them altogether is to be as parochial as the old gentleman at the club-window.

RICHARD BURGIN
New Concert Master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

HERALD. Oct. 1.

IN BOSTON TO JOIN SYMPHONY

Richard Burgin, New Concert Master Will Start Rehearsal Work Today

HAS WON FAME IN NORTHERN EUROPE

Richard Burgin, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who arrived in Boston from Norway yesterday, will sit this morning at the left of Conductor Pierre Monteux when he lifts his baton for the first rehearsal in preparation for the opening of the season, Oct. 8 and 9.

Although born in Warsaw and of Polish parentage, Mr. Burgin has spent the greater part of his musical career in Russia. Finland and Scandinavia, where as concert master, he won widespread fame.

Lotti His First Teacher

At the age of five he became acquainted with the violin, his original teacher being Lotti, who, with Kreisler, was a fellow-pupil with Massart, the French teacher of the Wieniawski school. When 13 years old he came to this country and in New York attracted considerable attention by his concerts in Carnegie Hall. It was in that city that he first heard of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, attending one of the orchestra's performances in New York. This, however, is his first visit to Boston.

In 1908 he began four years of training under Leopold Auer at Petrograd. Then followed a concert tour of Russia, Poland, Finland and Scandinavia, during which he played both as concert master and soloist. He has played under Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch, former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, likewise under Richard Strauss and Schneevoight, the Finnish conductor of the Philharmonic Society in Stockholm.

While in Stockholm he organized the "Richard Burgin Quartet," and also formed the Philharmonic Society of Christiania, a notable quartet, which played 12 concerts a season.

CONCERT MASTER BURGIN ARRIVES

Attends First Symphony Rehearsal Today

Won Fame in Orchestras in Russia and Scandinavia

Richard Burgin, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been engaged to fill the vacancy caused by the removal last season from that position of Frederick Fradkin, arrived in Boston yesterday from Christiania and will attend the first rehearsal of the orchestra this morning when it is opened by Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra.

Mr Burgin is a native of Warsaw, of Polish parentage, but his musical career has, by the fortunes of war, been confined for the most part to Russia, Finland and Scandinavia, where he has won widespread fame as a concert master in large orchestras during the past 12 years.

At the age of five, Mr Burgin made his first acquaintance with the violin, his original teacher being Lotti, who, with Fritz Kreisler, was the fellow-pupil of Massart, the great French teacher of the Wieniawski School. In 1902 Mr Burgin made his first public appearance as soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra in Warsaw.

He is not wholly strange to the United States, for at the age of 13 he spent some months in New York, attracting much attention by his concerts there and once attending a concert in that city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In 1908, he began four years of training under the great violin master, Leopold Auer, at Petrograd. Of the Auer pupils of long standing in America, Zimbalist came just before his time, Seidel came later, while Jascha Heifetz was his fellow pupil and friend.

There followed (in 1912) a concert tour of Russia, Poland, Finland, and Scandinavia. He played both as concert master and soloist with the Petrograd Symphony Orchestra, Helsingfors Symphony Orchestra, the Stockholm Concert Society Orchestra and the Christian Philharmonic Society. He played also notably as soloist in Petrograd, Kiev, Moscow, Odessa, Copenhagen, and elsewhere. He played as soloist in Stockholm at the Stockholm Opera House in the first public performance of the violin concerto of Sibelius, and likewise at Helsingfors with the same work under the direction of the famous Finnish composer.

He has played under Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch, former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, likewise under Richard Strauss, and under Schneevoight, the Finnish conductor of the Philharmonic Society in Stockholm.

He organized the Burgin Quartet in Stockholm. He likewise formed from the Philharmonic Society in Christiania, a notable quartet, which played 12 concerts a season, touring from city to city.

BURGIN IN SYMPHONY AS NEW CONCERT MASTER

Richard Bugrin, announced as the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took his place this morning in the orchestra when Pierre Monteux, the conductor, began rehearsals. Mr. Burgin arrived only yesterday from Norway.

In his youth, Mr. Burgin played in New York as a child violinist and attracted considerable attention. He studied with Lotti and Auer and has played under Fiedler, Nikisch and Strauss.

SYMPHONY OPENING

The program is now announced for the opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will take place Friday and Saturday under the conductorship of Pierre Monteux. The opening program will comprise Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, the so-called "Little Symphony"; a fantasie for orchestra by the French composer, Guillaume Lekeu; Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue, recently orchestrated by Gabriel Pierne, and, finally, Liszt's brilliant symphonic poem, "Tasso."

Symphony Starts Rehearsing

Rehearsals undertaken the past week by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the opening concerts of the season, next Friday and Saturday, Oct. 8 and 9.

In addition to the regular series, some special concerts on a large scale are being planned, and also a number of young people's concerts with regular conductor and full orchestra, thus further developing the experiment so successfully made last winter.

The programme consists of Beethoven's 8th symphony; a Fantasy for orchestra by G. Lekev; an orchestration of Cesar Franck's Prelude Chorale and Fugue, by Pierne, and Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Tasso."

POST Oct. 3

SYMPHONY'S NEW CONCERT MASTER

Richard Burgin of Warsaw, Distinguished Violinist of Experience Joins Famous Orchestra Today

RICHARD BURGIN,

BY OLIN DOWNES

Richard Burgin—"Boohrgeen," as his countrymen pronounce his name—the new concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in this city last night, and will take his place at the left of the conductor when Mr. Monteux directs the first rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1920-21 this morning in Symphony Hall.

BORN IN WARSAW

This is not Mr. Burgin's first American visit. In his 13th year he gave concerts in New York city, in Carnegie Hall and in Mendelssohn Hall. At that time he listened to a concert by the Boston Symphony, when the thought that he might some day be the concert-master of this orchestra was no doubt very far from his mind.

"Oh, yes," he said, asked if he noticed any difference between the America of that time and this one. "It is very different now. It is"—he hesitated for the right word—"so—dear."

He appears as alert a young man as his remark implies. He is only 28 years old, having been born in 1892 in Warsaw, Poland. His father was an artist and Richard was a child prodigy, beginning to play on the violin at five. He gave his first public concert in his 10th year, appearing as soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra in Warsaw.

With Famous Orchestras

He has survived the odium of precocious childhood very well indeed, being a frank, outspoken youth, brown-haired, light-complexioned, blue-eyed—a young man whose honors sit easily upon him, an exceptionally serious and broad-minded musician, but seldom disdainful, one would fancy, of a lark.

He studied the violin with Lotti, who, with Fritz Kreisler, was a pupil of Massart. Thus he must have acquired early the fine characteristics of the Wieniawski school. From 1908 to 1912 he was a pupil of Leopold Auer. In 1912 he undertook a concert tour of Russia, Poland, Finland, Scandinavia. He played as concert master and soloist with the Petrograd Symphony Orchestra, the Helsingfors Symphony Orchestra, the Stockholm Concert Society Orchestra, and the Christiania Philharmonic Society. He also appeared as soloist, notably in Petrograd, Kiev, Moscow, Odessa, Copenhagen. He played as soloist in Stockholm at what is said to have been the first public performance of Jean Sibelius' noble violin concerto, and he played the same work at Helsingfors with the composer conducting.

Likes Music of All Periods

Mr. Burgin organized the Burgin String Quartet in Stockholm and formed another quartet from the strings of the Philharmonic Society of Christiania when he was concert master of that body.

Asked about his tastes in music, whether he was a "modernist" or a "classicist," Mr. Burgin answered very sensibly that he did not care for either term as a definition of a musician's tastes or of a school of music.

"There are for me only two kinds of music," he said. "Music that is good and music that is bad. I like music of all periods when it is interesting. Perhaps I like some music which is not music. Thus, I am fascinated by much of the later music of Ravel. I think, though, that this is color more than music. One sees such music rather than hears it. You get certain aural effects, difficult if not impossible to analyze, and these effects to the ear are as rich colors to the eye.

Strauss Too Programmatic

"I am fond of some, though by no means all, of Richard Strauss', but the Strauss of 'Zarathustra,' 'Don Quixote,' the 'Domestic' symphony, I do not care for. His music is too 'programmatic.' Each page of music is intimately associated with some page of a novel or a story. Suppose you make a mistake as to which adventure of Don Quixote is being illustrated by the orchestra? Then you are all wrong. Then you have kissed the wrong girl in the dark. That is not what I call genuine music. It is music which is scenic, music for an ideal cinematograph—moving pictures, in a word, for the ear."

"There is a place for this kind of [illegible] it is [illegible] concert hall. The later Strauss is to me wholly a dramatic composer. I do not know his operas over well, but I think of him as primarily a composer for the theatre."

No Cubist Music Yet

"But don't you think music related to other arts? Is there not a connection between music and literature, music and painting, etc.?"

"Yes, there is. But the connection is usually observed at different times. Influences which show themselves in literature or painting are often a quarter-century later to be felt in music. Thus we had painters like the composer Maurice Ravel in the '90s. More lately we have had 'cubist' artists, so called. No 'cubist' composer is yet in circulation of whom I know. No doubt he will come. Whether he will be welcome we need not now inquire."

"What European country do you think holds out the most hope of musical advancement?" was the next question.

Most Hope in Russia

"I should say, undoubtedly Russia. There are more men there who are looking forward and striking out into new paths. This is also true of the Finn Sibelius, whose fifth symphony, played in 1914 in Finland, and recently revised by the composer, is even more impressionistic than his remarkable fourth. Certain Frenchmen continue to show new and astonishing perceptions."

Asked about the best orchestras in Europe, he said: "There are none to cope with American orchestras, since the war. In Germany, especially, the orchestras are composed principally of old men. There is nothing like the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Europe any longer."

BURGIN NEW SYMPHONY CONCERT MASTER

Last Friday rehearsals were begun by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the conductor, in preparation for the opening concerts to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Richard Burgin, celebrated Russian virtuoso, who is now concert master of the orchestra, arrived in Boston after a long voyage in time to be at his place at the left of the conductor on Friday morning.

The opening program now under preparation will begin with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony—the so-called "Little Symphony" with the fantastic Scherzo, burlesquing the metronome, which had just been invented at the time of its composition. The newest work at the opening pair of concerts will be the orchestral fantasy by Guillaume Lekeu, the noted French composer of the Franck school. Caesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue recently scored for full orchestra by Gabriel Pietne, will also be played, and, for a brilliant closing piece, Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Tasso."

Although Richard Burgin's training has been largely in Russia, and a considerable part of his professional career has been confined by stringent conditions in eastern Europe to Russia, Finland and Scandinavia, he is a native of Warsaw and of Polish parentage. Through 12 years he has made his mark as the finest concert master in that part of the world, leading the string sections of the premier orchestras in the larger cities of these countries. He revealed extraordinary talent at the age of 5 and came to America when 13 years old, playing in Carnegie Hall, New York. He has never been to Boston before, although at that time he heard a performance in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra. His tuition took place, for the most part, in Russia, where he first studied under Lotti; and in 1908 he began four years of training at Petrograd under the great violin teacher, Leopold Auer. Of the Auer pupils of long standing in America, Zimbalist came just before his time; Toscha Seidel came later, while Jascha Heifetz was his fellow-pupil and friend. He then made extensive concert tours through several countries, playing notably as soloist in Petrograd, Kiev, Moscow, Odessa, Copenhagen and other cities. He played as concert master and soloist with the Petrograd Symphony orchestra, the Helsingfors Symphony orchestra, the Stockholm Concert Society orchestra and the Christiania Philharmonic Society orchestra. He played as soloist in the first public performance of the violin concerta Sibelius, under the supervision of the noted composer.

On another occasion he played Glazounoff's concerto, the composer conducting.

Mr. Burgin has served as concert master under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony orchestra—Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch. Likewise, under Richard Strauss, at a Strauss festival in Stockholm, and under Schneevoight, the Finnish conductor of the Philharmonic Society in Stockholm and the Philharmonic orchestra of Christiania. Mr. Burgin has conducted this noted orchestra on several occasions, and he also instituted a quartet from its ranks, which toured from city to city, playing 12 concerts each year. Even more celebrated was the Burgin quartet of Stockholm, in which also he played first violin.

SYMPHONY'S NEW CONCERT MASTER

Richard Burgin of Warsaw, Distinguished Violinist of Experience Joins Famous Orchestra Today

RICHARD BURGIN,

BY OLIN DOWNES

Richard Burgin—"Boohrgeen," as his countrymen pronounce his name—the new concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in this city last night, and will take his place at the left of the conductor when Mr. Monteux directs the first rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1920-21 this morning in Symphony Hall.

BORN IN WARSAW

This is not Mr. Burgin's first American visit. In his 13th year he gave concerts in New York city, in Carnegie Hall and in Mendelssohn Hall. At that time he listened to a concert by the Boston Symphony, when the thought that he might some day be the concert-master of this orchestra was no doubt very far from his mind.

"Oh, yes," he said, asked if he noticed any difference between the America of that time and this one. "It is very different now. It is"—he hesitated for the right word—"so—dear."

He appears as alert a young man as his remark implies. He is only 28 years old, having been born in 1892 in Warsaw, Poland. His father was an artist and Richard was a child prodigy, beginning to play on the violin at five. He played as soloist in Stockholm at what is said to have been the first public performance of Jean Sibelius' noble violin concerto, and he playe the same work at Helsingfors with th composer conducting.

Likes Music of All Periods

Mr. Burgin organized the Burgi String Quartet in Stockholm and formed another quartet from the strings of the Philharmonic Society of Christiania when he was concert master of that body.

Asked about his tastes in music, whether he was a "modernist" or a "classicist," Mr. Burgin answered very sensibly that he did not care for either term as a definition of a musician's tastes or of a school of music.

"There are for me only two kinds of music," he said. "Music that is good and music that is bad. I like music of all periods when it is interesting. Perhaps I like some music which is not music. Last Friday rehearsals were begun by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the conductor, in preparation for the opening concerts to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Richard Burgin, celebrated Russian virtuoso, who is now concert master of the orchestra, arrived in Boston after a long voyage in time to be at his place at the left of the conductor on Friday morning.

The opening program now under preparation will begin with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony—the so-called "Little Symphony" with the fantastic Scherzo, burlesquing the metronome, which had just been invented at the time of its composition. The newest work at the opening pair of concerts will be the orchestral fantasy by Guillaume Lekeu, the noted French composer of the Franck school. Caesar Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue recently scored for full orchestra by Gabriel Pietne, will also be played, and, for a brilliant closing piece, Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Tasso."

Although Richard Burgin's training has been largely in Russia, and a considerable part of his professional career has been confined by stringent conditions in eastern Europe to Russia, Finland and Scandinavia, he is a native of Warsaw and of Polish parentage. Through 12 years he has made his mark as the finest concert master in that part of the world, leading the string sections of the premier orchestras in the larger cities of these countries. He revealed extraordinary talent at the age of 5 and came to America when 13 years old, playing in Carnegie Hall, New York. He has never been to Boston before, although at that time he heard a performance in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra. His tuition took place, for the most part, in Russia, where he first studied under Lotti; and in 1908 he began four years of training at Petrograd under the great violin teacher, Leopold Auer. Of the Auer pupils of long standing in America, Zimbalist came just before his time; Toscha Seidel came later, while Jascha Heifetz was his fellow-pupil and friend. He then made extensive concert tours through several countries, playing notably as soloist in Petrograd, Kiev, Moscow, Odessa, Copenhagen and other cities. He played as concert master and soloist with the Petrograd Symphony orchestra, the Helsingfors Symphony orchestra, the Stockholm Concert Society orchestra and the Christiania Philharmonic Society orchestra. He played as soloist in the first public performance of the violin concerta Sibelius, under the supervision of the noted composer.

On another occasion he played Glazounoff's concerto, the composer conducting.

Mr. Burgin has served as concert master under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony orchestra—Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch. Likewise, under Richard Strauss, at a Strauss festival in Stockholm, and under Schneevoight, the Finnish conductor of the Philharmonic Society in Stockholm and the Philharmonic orchestra of Christiania. Mr. Burgin has conducted this noted orchestra on several occasions, and he also instituted a quartet from its ranks, which toured from city to city, playing 12 concerts each year. Even more celebrated was the Burgin quartet of Stockholm, in which also he played first violin.

NEW SYMPHONY RICH IN TALENT

With Ranks Full Outlook for Boston Organization Is Best in History

By FRED J. McISAAC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with full ranks, a distinguished new concert master, and Pierr Monteaux, its conductor, commences another season under better conditions than have prevailed since the World War first sewed dissentions in its ranks.

A less virile organization would have been completely ruined by any one of thre of four disasters which have befallen it during the past three seasons.

That Boston still possesses the finest orchestra in the world is very largely due to the courage and skill of Manager W. H. Brennan, who knew what to do and where to go to to repair the damage caused by these disasters.

ROWS HURT ORCHESTRA.

The first catastrophe was the loss of Dr. Muck. But the playing quality of the orchestra had been gradually going off before the government jailed the Kaiser's chum. The Germans, French and other aliens in the ranks had been squabbling among themselves for a season or two, and only the Prussian discipline of Muck kept them from assaulting one another with their fiddles.

The orchestra finished out the season without Muck, but under another German conductor, and then a third of its personnel, who were enemy aliens, were deposited in the discard.

Even at that time the Boston Symphony Orchestra was isolated among symphony orchestras in the country because of its refusal to let its players be unionized. Securing new men of the calibre of the Germans seemed an impossible task. Yet that was the job accomplished by Brennan before the new season opened.

In the meantime it had been impossible to secure a great conductor and the directors were forced to accept Henri Rabaud, a good routine opera conductor from Paris. Monteux filled in for two or three concerts because Rabaud was late in arriving and his work in welding the new element in the orchestra won him very favorable comment.

The progress made under Rabaud was very slight. He was a nice old gentleman, but aside from Cesar Franck and Saint Saens he didn't know any symphonies, and much as we hated the Germans we didn't think they deserved some of the performances he gave German symphonies.

That Spring a lot of new orchestras, which sprang up like mushrooms around the country raided Boston and carried off a number of players, and it was necessary for Mr. Brennan to repair damages again.

The troubles of last season are too recent to worry about. Thirty-five players went on strike. The directors of the orchestra exhibited so little task that their efforts to straighten things out made them worse, and for some weeks the Boston Symphony Orchestra contained only seventy-five musicians.

Manager Brennan again exhibited acumen by failing to fill up the ranks in a hurry, preferring to wait until he could secure first class men for every position. Some of the strikers straggled back and some found they were not wanted when they came back.

SUBSCRIPTIONS LIBERAL.

All this sounds as though the Boston Symphony were pretty thoroughly disrupted, but it was never so bad as it appeared.

In every orchestra there ar about twenty or thirty men upon whom everything depends. These are the leaders of the different desks, and they are the backbone of the orchestra. Had these men gone out the orchestra would have been ruined indeed, but they have been loyal from the start and filling up the gaps has been comparatively easy since it did not include replacing any of them.

I am informed that the subscription to the orchestra concerts has been the best in years and there is every indication of a prosperous and untroubled season.

THREE PLAYERS SUE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is sued in three $10,000 suits entered in the Suffolk superior court by three former players, who seek damages for alleged breach of their contracts. They are Rudolph Nagel, violoncello; Gustav F. Heim, trumpet, and Fortunato Sordillo, trombone. They say they were hired for the seasons 1919-20 to 1921-1922, inclusive, but were dismissed on March [illegible] last. Nagel and Sordillo say their pay under the contracts was $60 a week each and Heim says his pay was $85.72 a week. Arthur Berenson is counsel for the plaintiffs.

40TH SYMPHONY SEASON TO OPEN

Valuable New Members in String Section Increase Orchestra's Strength

PROGRAM FOR THIS WEEK'S CONCERTS

By PHILIP HALE

The 40th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin with the concert tomorrow afternoon. The orchestra has been strengthened by the addition of valuable new members, chiefly in the string section. This season there will be ten double basses instead of eight. There is a new flute player, replacing the regretted Charles de Mailly.

In spite of the malicious statements that have been published in New York, the orchestra is today of the high standard that made it famous in the past years. Only members that could easily be spared, with one or two exceptions, deserted the orchestra last season. The places of these exceptions have been more than adequately filled. The sale of seats has been gratifyingly large. There are no seats purchasable for the Friday concerts, and the subscription sale for Saturday nights is far greater than it has been in the preceding years.

The program of the concerts this week is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony, No. 8; Lekeu, Fantasia on two folk tunes of Anjou; Franck, Prelude, Chorale and Fugue (orchestrated by Pierne); Liszt's symphonic poem. "Tasso."

Beethoven's eighth Symphony has been on the program of a Boston Symphony concert beginning the season only once in 30 years. During these years Symphonies of Beethoven have had the honor 19 times. The C Minor was the favorite; next to it the Eiroca; then the seventh. The second was played at opening concerts twice; the Pastoral once. At other concerts the symphonies at the opening concert were by Schumann, Brahms, Tschaikowsky, Dvorak and Franck.

The Fantasia by Lekeu and Pierne's orchestral transcription will be performed here for the first time. Lekeu, a Belgian, who died too young, is known in Boston chiefly by his violin sonata. The Fantasia was composed in 1891-92. Pierne's transcription of Franck's noble and familiar piano piece, first played here by Harold Bauer, was brought out at a Colonne concert, Paris, in 1904.

The program of the concerts next week includes Enesco's Symphony, Brahm's piano concerto, No. 1, and the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz. Harold Bauer will play the concerto for the third time in Boston with this orchestra.

HERALD Oct. 7.

The Musical Courier hears that Mr. d'Indy is disposed to revisit the United States, late next winter and to improve the occasion as "guest-conductor" of American orchestras playing his own music. No doubt, also, he would be glad to share in a performance of his opera-oratorio, "The Legend of St. Christopher" which he regards as the summit of his work. When the composer last visted America in 1905 he was the guest of the Boston Orchestra.

According to Theodore Spiering, the violinist, who revisited Germany last summer, Dr. Muck brought "to pre-war standards," the recent performances in Munich of Wagner's "Ring" operas. There Mr. Spiering also heard Pfitzner's much praised music-drama, "Palestrina" and judged it labored and dull.

SYMPHONY BILL WELL PLAYED

Opening Concert Reflects Brilliance of Boston Orchestra; French Numbers Given

By FRED J. McISAAC

The fortieth year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall in the usual unceremonious manner in which Symphony seasons begin. There was a capacity audience, and I understand that the subscription this season is the best for several years.

Pierre Monteux is again the conductor. Mr. Bergin, the new concert master, who comes from Scandinavia, occupied the chair so curiously vacated by Fradkin last season. Fradkin was the first American concert master. They went back to Europe for his successor.

PLAYS BEAUTIFULLY

There were many new faces in the band, also; and of course the old reliables. With such men as Theodorowicz, Hoffman, Gerardi, Denayer, Mullaly, Schroeder, Barth, Keller Seydel, Longy, Lenom, Laurent, Brook, Vanini, Sand and Kloepfel remain; the Boston Symphony is not fundamentally disturbed.

Naturally we were all interested to hear how the reconstructed orchestra would sound. Considering that it was the opening concert of the season, and that a score or so of the men were new, it sounded beautifully. No orchestra in America can approach it yet. To be sure it is not the band it was in 1914, but the gap between the old Boston Symphony and all other orchestras was so wide that the orchestra could be shattered worse than it has been, and still be supreme.

FANTASIA CHORUS

The program yesterday was Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. I have never enjoyed Beethoven as interpreted by Monteux, and yesterday's performance was no exception. I think he reads passion and fire into these scores at the expense of their sweetness, elegance and grace.

There were two interesting French numbers on the program. The first was a symphonic fantasia by Lekeu, played for the first time in Boston. Lekeu was a young Frenchman who died a generation ago at the age of twenty-four as a result of eating bad ice cream. He might have been a very great composer if he had lived. This fantasia is supposed to picture a rustic dance from which two lovers steal to spoon in the moonlight. It had atmosphere, passion and the aroma of a Summer moonlight night and it pleased the audience mightily. It was performed with exquisite care by Mr. Monteux.

Next came an orchestral setting by Gabriel Pierne of a prelude, choral, and composed for the piano by Cesar Franck. Pierne caught very well the orchestral method familiar to those who know the Franck symphonies. The work itself is too long, like most Cesar Franck things, but has its moments of austere grandeur and magnificence. The familiar tone poem of Liszt, "Tasso," was finely performed at the end of the program.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SUPERFINE

Opens 40th Season With Display of Virtuosity

BY OLIN DOWNES

The opening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

When last season ended there was an orchestra diminished in numbers by the strike; there was doubt and anxiety in some minds concerning the artistic future of the organization and the probable quality of its personnel and performances this year. But when the audience entered the auditorium yesterday, an orchestra with its full complement of players confronted them, and either these players are, if anything, better than the players who left the orchestra last spring, or else Mr. Monteux accomplished even more remarkable results with an orchestra of newly revised personnel than he did with the crippled orchestra which ended the season of 1919-20.

TONE RICH AND BRILLIANT

The performances were without exception of surprising euphony and technical precision. The tone quality of the ensemble is both rich and brilliant, particularly in the strings, and it would be invidious at this time to make detailed comparison of the exquisite solo playing of various members of the wind chorus. Above all—and a great test, anyhow, of the true quality of an orchestra—was the delicacy, the tonal beauty and fulness of "pianissimo" passages.

Most of the programme was familiar. There was one novelty in the form of a virtuoso interpretation of Lekeu's Fantasy for orchestra founded on two folk-themes and a "programme" not printed in the original score of the work. But this programme is supplied on the fly-leaf of a four-hand arrangement. It is a tale, a fantasy, of youthful festivity and passion. The walls rock to the dance, as they do when Lenau's Mephistopheles fiddles for Faust and his partner. The youth and maiden disappear from the crowd. There is a love scene in the midst of nature.

Exciting and Mystical

We had as soon not have been bothered with this programme. The music, if somewhat lacking in formal balance and cohesion, as it impressed the writer at a first hearing, is in itself sufficiently exciting, imaginative and frequently mystical in its sensuousness. The Lekeu of haunting pages of chamber and music is found again in mysterious interludes interrupted by wild recurrences or reminiscences of the dance. The transformation of the principal dance themes—there are two folk-themes, but one greatly predominates the work—are more than ingenious, more than "clever," show true creative power.

No wonder the audience applauded this performance of an effective and exacting work by Mr. Monteux and his men, who were called to their feet to acknowledge, with their conductor, the applause.

Caesar Franck Transferred

And yet, by the side of this work, rather tentative, with all its interest and subjectivity, was another which by virtue of its formal strength and grandeur make Lekeu's composition almost amateurish. This was the "Prelude Chorale, and Fugue" of Caesar Franck, originally for the piano, in an orchestral version by Gabriel Pierne. The composition proved one of the few works for piano which do not seem swollen and distorted at the hands of the orchestra. The ideas are so big, the form so extended, the utterance so lofty and inspired. There is a nature in this music, a mood, not a whit less sensitive and intimate than that of Lekeu, yet these moods are captured and perpetuated for all time in a form as powerful and enduring as a mountain range.

The orchestration of Pierne is astonishingly in good taste, in absolute sympathy with the colors as well as the moods in the composer's mind. Anybody, today, can dress up a piece of piano music and give it orchestral clothes which it does not know how to wear, and which look out of place on it. But here, with Pierne, was the characteristic shadowy richness and gorgeousness of Franck. It is a masterpiece of coloring.

Intelligently Scored

Take the chorale, and think of the glowing, transparent tone qualities of the upper instruments which include, if memory serves, some of the woodwind, a harp, a celesta, and then add the vague and sombre colors of other instruments in deep registers of the orchestra which form the background for the swaying chorale. The censer-like chorale, with the bell of the celesta ringing far, far up, as [illegible] topmost niche of some cathedral.

Saying which, and admitting the absolute genius of the accomplishment, we say we prefer this superb composition in its original form, as Franck wrote it, for the piano. This may be pure prejudice. Probably it is, in view of the perfect realization of Franck's idiom with instruments, the clarity which may be obtained by strings, but never by a piano, in the fugue, the matchless splendor of the climaxes when taken up by the brass.

Beethoven's Eighth

The programme opened with Beethoven's 8th symphony, one of the four of the nine symphonies of Beethoven which remain artistically complete and proportionate—as the 9th symphony is not—and as yet secure from ravages of time. These 4 are the 3d, the 5th, the 7th and the 8th. Mr. Monteux showed himself thoroughly in accord with the Beethovenish virility and humor of the whole work.

Of course musicians will always discuss the right tempo of the first part of the third movement. But no one will discuss the wondrous singing of the wind instruments of the orchestra in the trio of this movement, or the general clarity, excellence, animation of the performance.

POST Oct. 9

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS OPEN

What more fitting introduction for the opening of the season of Symphony concerts than the program rendered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Mr. Pierre Monteux conducting.

The first number was Bethoven's eighth symphony in F major Bethoven has described this work as a "little symphony in F" as distinguishing it from the seventh in A. The brightness and cheer of this composition are felt from the first strains "Allegro vivace e con brio" to the last measure of the last movement "Allegro Vivace" and Mr. Monteux proved by his interpretation that the work was far from being "little."

The sceond number was a symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk Songs by Guillume Lekeu. This is the first time this composition has been played in Boston, though it has been performed in New York by the Symphony Society. This beautiful and expressive work was delightfully portrayed.

Cesar Franck's Prelude Chorale and Fugue (for piano) which has been orchestrated is full of majesty and serenity

The last number was Liszt's second symphonic poem, "Tasso Lamento e Trionfo" and is a vivid portrayal of the utter sorrow and despondency of the poet Tasso and his final triumph.

The splendid orchestra once more complete and filled with renewed impetus is an instrument which promises a season of all that is best and greatest in music.

TRAV. Oct. 9

SMOOTH OPENING FOR THE SYMPHONY

Capacity Audience to Hear Remodeled Orchestra

Lekeu's Fantasia, Franck's 'Prelude' Among the Novelties

GLOBE Oct. 9

Nothing at yesterday's Symphony concert, the first of the new season, showed that the orchestra experienced unprecedented difficulties last year. The usual capacity audience displayed the usual enthusiasm for a performance which averaged as well as first concerts of other seasons by an orchestra with no vacant places in it, led by an excellent conductor.

All the subscription seats for the Friday series were sold long since, and fewer than usual of the Saturday seats remain available. The rush seats, too, were filled yesterday without the aid of a soloist to account for the fact. The croakers who have been saying that the Boston Symphony was done for were egregiously mistaken.

The quality of the new players is superior on the whole to that of the men they replace, who, with two or three exceptions, will never be missed. The ensemble playing will be somewhat bettered as the season progresses, doubtless, but that has invariably occurred in former years.

The Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, called "little" because it is shorter and less profound than the others, demands an unerring precision and delicacy in performance if it is to make its full effect on the listener. It has not the overwhelming emotional power which hides all minor surface faults at a hearing of the Fifth or "Eroica." Yesterday a slight unevenness in attacks and an occasional lack of proper subordination which allowed wrong groups of instruments to stand out momentarily were noticeable. These faults are inevitable at the first concert after a long vacation period.

Of the two novelties, Lekeu's Fantasia is the more admirable. It is the work of a young master, who died at 24, written under the influence of his teachers, Franck and D'Indy, yet not without its own originality and power.

Franck's "Prelude, Chorale and Fugue" is among the best-known modern piano pieces. We doubt whether its composer would have approved of Pierne's arrangement for orchestra. Beethoven once said that no one could transfer satisfactorily a work originally conceived in terms of one medium to another.

Liszt's showy but empty "Tasso" has a fire and verve in it which atoned for the few minor blemishes. All in all, yesterday's concert was a triumph for all concerned, especially for Mr Monteux, whose patient zeal made it possible. Next week Harold Bauer will play the piano part in Brahm's First Concerto. The other numbers are Enesco's Symphony and Berlioz' Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

At other concerts the symphonies at the opening concert were by Schumann, Brahms, Tschaikowsky, Dvorak and Franck.

The Fantasia by Lekeu and Pierne's orchestral transcription will be performed here for the first time. Lekeu, a Belgian, who died too young, is known in Boston chiefly by his violin sonata. The Fantasia was composed in 1891-92. Pierne's transcription of Franck's noble and familiar piano piece, first played here by Harold Bauer, was brought out at a Colonne concert, Paris, in 1904.

The program of the concerts next week includes Enesco's Symphony, Brahm's piano concerto, No. 1, and the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz. Harold Bauer will play the concerto for the third time in Boston with this orchestra.

HERALD Oct. 7.

The Musical Courier hears that Mr. d'Indy is disposed to revisit the United States, late next winter and to improve the occasion as "guest-conductor" of American orchestras playing his own music. No doubt, also, he would be glad to share in a performance of his opera-oratorio, "The Legend of St. Christopher" which he regards as the summit of his work. When the composer last visited America in 1905 he was the guest of the Boston Orchestra.

According to Theodore Spiering, the violinist, who revisited Germany last summer, Dr. Muck brought "to pre-war standards," the recent performances in Munich of Wagner's "Ring" operas. There Mr. Spiering also heard Pfitzner's much praised music-drama, "Palestrina" and judged it labored and dull.

SYMPHONY BILL WELL PLAYED

Opening Concert Reflects Brilliance of Boston Orchestra; French Numbers Given

By FRED J. McISAAC.

The fortieth year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall in the usual unceremonious manner in which Symphony seasons begin. There was a capacity audience, and I understand that the subscription this season is the best for several years.

Pierre Monteux is again the conductor. Mr. Bergin, the new concert master, who comes from Scandinavia, occupied the chair so curiously vacated by Fradkin last season. Fradkin was the first American concert master. They went back to Europe for his successor.

PLAYS BEAUTIFULLY

There were many new faces in the band, also; and of course the old reliables. With such men as Theodorowicz, Hoffman, Gerardi, Denayer, Mullaly, Schroeder, Barth, Keller Seydel, Longy, Lenom, Laurent, Brook, Vanini, Sand and Kloepfel remain; the Boston Symphony is not fundamentally disturbed.

Naturally we were all interested to hear how the reconstructed orchestra would sound. Considering that it was the opening concert of the season, and that a score or so of the men were new, it sounded beautifully. No orchestra in America can approach it yet. To be sure it is not the band it was in 1914, but the gap between the old Boston Symphony and all other orchestras was so wide that the orchestra could be shattered worse than it has been, and still be supreme.

FANTASIA CHORUS

The program yesterday was Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. I have never enjoyed Beethoven as interpreted by Monteux, and yesterday's performance was no exception. I think he reads passion and fire into these scores at the expense of their sweetness, elegance and grace.

There were two interesting French numbers on the program. The first was a symphonic fantasia by Lekeu, played for the first time in Boston. Lekeu was a young Frenchman who died a generation ago at the age of twenty-four as a result of eating bad ice cream. He might have been a very great composer if he had lived. This fantasia is supposed to picture a rustic dance from which two lovers steal to spoon in the moonlight. It had atmosphere, passion and the aroma of a Summer moonlight night and it pleased the audience mightily. It was performed with exquisite care by Mr. Monteux.

Next came an orchestral setting by Gabriel Pierne of a prelude, choral, and composed for the piano by Cesar Franck. Pierne caught very well the orchestral method familiar to those who know the Franck symphonies. The work itself is too long, like most Cesar Franck things, but has its moments of austere grandeur and magnificence. The familiar tone poem of Liszt, "Tasso," was finely performed at the end of the prograr

Opens 40th Season With Display of Virtuosity

BY OLIN DOWNES

The opening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

When last season ended there was an orchestra diminished in numbers by the strike; there was doubt and anxiety in some minds concerning the artistic future of the organization and the probable quality of its personnel and performances this year. But when the audience entered the auditorium yesterday, an orchestra with its full complement of players confronted them, and either these players are, if anything, better than the players who left the orchestra last spring, or else Mr. Monteux accomplished even more remarkable results with an orchestra of newly revised personnel than he did with the crippled orchestra which ended the season of 1919-20.

TONE RICH AND BRILLIANT

The performances were without exception of surprising euphony and technical precision. The tone quality of the ensemble is both rich and brilliant, particularly in the strings, and it would be invidious at this time to make detailed comparison of the exquisite solo playing of various members of the wind chorus. Above all—and a great test, anyhow, of the true quality of an orchestra—was the delicacy, the tonal beauty and fulness of "pianissimo" passages.

Most of the programme was familiar. There was one novelty in the form of a virtuoso interpretation of Lekeu's Fantasy for orchestra founded on two folk-themes and a "programme" not printed in the original score of the work. But this programme is supplied on the fly-leaf of a four-hand arrangement. It is a tale, a fantasy, of youthful festivity and passion. The walls rock to the dance, as they do when Lenau's Mephistopheles fiddles for Faust and his partner. The youth and maiden disappear from the crowd. There is a love scene in the midst of nature.

Exciting and Mystical

We had as soon not have been bothered with this programme. The music, if somewhat lacking in formal balance and cohesion, as it impressed the writer at a first hearing, is in itself sufficiently exciting, imaginative and frequently mystical in its sensuousness. The Lekeu of haunting pages of chamber and music is found again in mysterious interludes interrupted by wild recurrences or reminiscences of the dance. The transformation of the principal dance themes—there are two folk-themes, but one greatly predominates the work—are more than ingenious, more than "clever," show true creative power.

No wonder the audience applauded this performance of an effective and exacting work by Mr. Monteux and his men, who were called to their feet to acknowledge, with their conductor, the applause.

Caesar Franck Transferred

And yet, by the side of this work, rather tentative, with all its interest and subjectivity, was another which by virtue of its formal strength and grandeur make Lekeu's composition almost amateurish. This was the "Prelude Chorale, and Fugue" of Caesar Franck, originally for the piano, in an orchestral version by Gabriel Pierne. The composition proved one of the few works for piano which do not seem swollen and distorted at the hands of the orchestra. The ideas are so big, the form so extended, the utterance so lofty and inspired. There is a nature in this music, a mood, not a whit less sensitive and intimate than that of Lekeu, yet these moods are captured and perpetuated for all time in a form as powerful and enduring as a mountain range.

The orchestration of Pierne is astonishingly in good taste, in absolute sympathy with the colors as well as the moods in the composer's mind. Anybody, today, can dress up a piece of piano music and give it orchestral clothes which it does not know how to wear, and which look out of place on it. But here, with Pierne, was the characteristic shadowy richness and gorgeousness of Franck. It is a masterpiece of coloring.

Intelligently Scored

Take the chorale, and think of the glowing, transparent tone qualities of the upper instruments which include, if memory serves, some of the woodwind, a harp, a celesta, and then add the vague and sombre colors of other instruments in deep registers of the orchestra which form the background for the swaying chorale. The censer-like chorale, with the bell of the celesta ringing far, far up, as if in the very topmost niche of some cathedral!

Saying which, and admitting the absolute genius of the accomplishment, we say we prefer this superb composition in its original form, as Franck wrote it, for the piano. This may be pure prejudice. Probably it is, in view of the perfect realization of Franck's idiom with instruments, the clarity which may be obtained by strings, but never by a piano, in the fugue, the matchless splendor of the climaxes when taken up by the brass.

Beethoven's Eighth

The programme opened with Beethoven's 8th symphony, one of the four of the nine symphonies of Beethoven which remain artistically complete and proportionate—as the 9th symphony is not—and as yet secure from ravages of time. These 4 are the 3d, the 5th, the 7th and the 8th. Mr. Monteux showed himself thoroughly in accord with the Beethovenish virility and humor of the whole work.

Of course musicians will always discuss the right tempo of the first part of the third movement. But no one will discuss the wondrous singing of the wind instruments of the orchestra in the trio of this movement, or the general clarity, excellence, animation of the performance.

POST Oct. 9

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS OPEN

What more fitting introduction for the opening of the season of Symphony concerts than the program rendered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Mr. Pierre Monteux conducting

The first number was Bethoven's eighth symphony in F major Bethoven has described this work as a "little symphony in F" as distinguishing it from the seventh in A. The brightness and cheer of this composition are felt from the first strains "Allegro vivace e con brio" to the last measure of the last movement "Allegro Vivace" and Mr. Monteux proved by his interpretation that the work was far from being "little."

The second number was a symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk Songs by Guillume Lekeu. This is the first time this composition has been played in Boston, though it has been performed in New York by the Symphony Society. This beautiful and expressive work was delightfully portrayed.

Cesar Franck's Prelude Chorale and Fugue (for piano) which has been orchestrated is full of majesty and serenity

The last number was Liszt's second symphonic poem, "Tasso Lamento e Trionfo" and is a vivid portrayal of the utter sorrow and despondency of the poet Tasso and his final triumph.

The splendid orchestra once more complete and filled with renewed impetus is an instrument which promises a season of all that is best and greatest in music.

SMOOTH OPENING FOR THE SYMPHONY

Capacity Audience to Hear Remodeled Orchestra

Lekeu's Fantasia, Franck's 'Preludé' Among the Novelties

GLOBE Oct. 9

Nothing at yesterday's Symphony concert, the first of the new season, showed that the orchestra experienced unprecedented difficulties last year. The usual capacity audience displayed the usual enthusiasm for a performance which averaged as well as first concerts of other seasons by an orchestra with no vacant places in it, led by an excellent conductor.

All the subscription seats for the Friday series were sold long since, and fewer than usual of the Saturday seats remain available. The rush-seats, too, were filled yesterday without the aid of a soloist to account for the fact. The croakers who have been saying that the Boston Symphony was done for were egregiously mistaken.

The quality of the new players is superior on the whole to that of the men they replace, who, with two or three exceptions, will never be missed. The ensemble playing will be somewhat bettered as the season progresses, doubtless, but that has invariably occurred in former years.

The Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, called "little" because it is shorter and less profound than the others, demands an unerring precision and delicacy in performance if it is to make its full effect on the listener. It has not the overwhelming emotional power which hides all minor surface faults at a hearing of the Fifth or "Eroica." Yesterday a slight unevenness in attacks and an occasional lack of proper subordination which allowed wrong groups of instruments to stand out momentarily were noticeable. These faults are inevitable at the first concert after a long vacation period.

Of the two novelties, Lekeu's Fantasia is the more admirable. It is the work of a young master, who died at 24, written under the influence of his teachers, Franck and D'Indy, yet not without its own originality and power.

Franck's "Prelude, Chorale and Fugue" is among the best-known modern piano pieces. We doubt whether its composer would have approved of Pierne's arrangement for orchestra. Beethoven once said that no one could transfer satisfactorily a work originally conceived in terms of one medium to another.

Liszt's showy but empty "Tasso" had a fire and verve in it which atoned for the few minor blemishes. All in all, yesterday's concert was a triumph for all concerned, especially for Mr Monteux, whose patient zeal made it possible. Next week Harold Bauer will play the piano part in Brahm's First Concerto. The other numbers are Enesco's Symphony and Berlioz' Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The first concert of the fortieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on the afternoon of October 8, 1920. The following was the program:

Beethoven ....Eignth Symphony
Lekeu......Symphonic Fantasia on Two Folk Songs of Anjou
Franck.......Prelude, Chorale and Fugue (orchestrated by Gabriel Pierné)
Liszt ....Tasso

The program happily combined the novel and the familiar, the Fantasia by Lekeu and Pierné's orchestral arrangement of the Franck piece being played for the first time in Boston. Of Beethoven's Symphony little need be said. If not one of his greatest, it is one of the most charming, and served well as an opening piece for the season.

Due respect having thus been shown to the classics, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra next turned their attention to the most interesting part of the afternoon's program—Lekeu's Fantasia. This is no trivial potpourri of folk tunes, contrived in the manner of Saint-Saëns and his imitators, no mere series of variations and contrapuntal contortions often clever, sometimes interesting. but rarely creating a mood, an atmosphere.

This Fantasia is a closely knit, skillfully developed symphonic movement. The fact that the thematic material is based on folk song is of secondary interest. The obviousness is filled with a poetic and refined beauty which sharply distinguishes it from the rough, uncouth yet realistic portrayal of folk scenes to which we are too often subjected. Of particular beauty are the closing pages, and the passages for oboe, 'cello and viola solo. The orchestra played with evident enthusiasm for the work.

There are orchestral transcriptions of piano pieces which are often recreative and bring out new and unexpected beauties, as for example, Weingartner's arrangement of Chabrier's Bourrée Fantasque, played in Boston last season. Piano pieces which sound well in orchestral dress are usually those which, although given to the world in pianistic form, were probably conceived by the composer in the orchestra' idiom. Franck's Prelude Chorale and Fugue are too pianistic to make their full appeal in orchestral versions. Pierné's arrangement is cleverly made; indeed, the piano version is often rather too literally transferred to the orchestra. Only occasionally does he catch the mysticism of the music, as in the bass-drum strokes in the Chorale. More often he does the obvious thing, as any clever pupil might do in a similar exercise. It must be confessed that arrangements of this character seem futile, apart from their value as exercises and examples for a class in orchestration.

Liszt's Tasso is not one of his most familiar orchestral compositions, nor yet one of his greatest. Still it is effective, and although all the composer's well known methods of procedure are in evidence the work is of more than passing interest.

The orchestra has undergone many changes during the past year. On the whole these changes seem to be for the better. It would perhaps not be altogether just to mention at this time an occasional roughness of tone, an occasional lack of precision. These slight imperfections will no doubt disappear in the course of the season. The orchestra did its best work in Lekeu's Fantasia. Here was flexibility and great beauty of tone, giving promise of what is to come in the next few weeks.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN OLD-NEW ORCHESTRA BEGINS A NEW SEASON

The Band Refilled with Youthful and Cosmopolitan Recruits—Present Qualities Well Reflecting the Conductor—Lekeu's Fantasia for Novel and Notable Piece—Liszt in True Eloquence, but Dubious and Debatable Beethoven

IN the interests of the hour, at the first Symphony Concert of the fortieth annual series, the orchestra, yesterday afternoon, stood above all else. As it gradually assembled on the stage of Symphony Hall, it was soon clear that, according to promise, conductor and manager had quietly and efficiently refilled the decimated ranks of last spring. The present roster of the band numbers ninety-seven musicians in Boston and at work. To these, five more, now under engagement, will be added, raising the full force of the orchestra to 102—the amplest "personnel" in its history. When the second part of the programme mustered nearly the whole band, observant frequenters of the concerts quickly discovered that it was more youthful in aspect than for many a year. Fortunately the secession of last spring removed not a little elderly and cumbering "deadwood," too long permitted to linger lest the governing powers should seem hard-hearted. As fortunately conductor and manager have sought and found newcomers in young prime, and by such fresh blood the Symphony Orchestra, like any other organized body tending to become static and institutional, is the gainer.

A glance at the page of the programme-book listing this "personnel" was equally inspiriting. Here was a German, there a Frenchman, next an Italian; a little further an American; hard by a Hollander, an Englishman, a Czech, a Slav; then, say, a Pole; and, finally, to fill the measure, a Greek and also an Irishman. In all the long past, never has the orchestra been more various, more cosmopolitan, in the nationality of the members. Clearly only individual fitness has weighed in the refilling of the band. Again the trustees have taken the way of wisdom; again Mr. Monteux as choosing conductor, has proved his rare and signal breadth of mind; again Mr. Brennan, manager and co-operator in these things, has had thought only of the best interests of the band. For the time at least, perhaps for a long future every open or secret desire to nationalize the orchestra, to make it narrowly French, German, American, what not, has been frustrated. As it should be, it is as broad-spreading and cosmopolitan as the art of music it serves. Once again, in "personnel" as in programmes, it asserts its high and fine tradition of catholicity. In equal measure, the trustees and Mr. Monteux have maintained it and thanks and praise from the frequenters of the concerts should go out to them.

Of the quality of the orchestra thus refilled, it is too early to speak either with detail or with certainty. Especially in cities to the Southward, envious detractors, still smarting under years of fruitless rivalry, like to descant upon the decline of the band. Over-zealous partisans at home are as prone to declare that it is again at its best estate. Both assertions err by excess; since, in sober and ascertainable fact, from the concerts of 1918-19 through the first concert of this new season of 1920, the band has seldom risen so high and still more seldom fallen so low as these zealots respectively contend. As it was yesterday, it had been in rehearsal through no more than a week; the newcomers have had barely time to find themselves, become accustomed to strange surroundings, feel out their fellows and their chief; while for a first occasion on Friday, they experienced the public to which they will minister. In the merest common sense, the refilled orchestra is necessarily at beginnings.

Yet a few inferences seem clear and safe. Already the new-old orchestra is responsive and sensitive to the conductor. Most of the intractables to a new dispensation, who occasionally hampered Mr. Monteux last year—rather by inertia than overt act—have departed; while the spirit they represented has altogether vanished. The orchestra is at one with a conductor who deserves its every loyalty and sensibility. It not only hears and obeys; it does both with sympathy and zest. Furthermore: there is no doubting that the string choir plays, at the conductor's will, with an exceeding vitality, incisiveness, precision and power of tone; that the wood-winds and the horns keep old sensuous quality and finesse; that the brass does not lack large sonority; that to the familiar virtuosi of recent years are to be added such newcomers as Mr. Burgin as concert-master, and Mr. Amerena as third flute; that among the recruits are young musicians of proved skill and as clear promise. For the time the shortcomings are a tendency to power rather than to plasticity, to vigors at the expense of delicacy, especially in finely-matched euphonies, to sweep in preference to shading. The rhythmic vigor, the songful warmth, the ardent progress of the orchestra commend it. As yet it is not so fortunate in modulation, in supple advance through long gradients of tone.

To write these sayings is also to write that in not a few of these respects, the orchestra is already taking voice and color from Mr. Monteux himself. He and it were at their best when they unrolled the tonal panorama, sounded the romantic heights and depths of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso." Their performance was like a spectacle upon the theatre of the imagination. Out of the incisive beginning rose the sombre and distraught figure of the poet Liszt would summon; the motiv and measures that would sing his woes pierced the ear and in degrees touched the heart; Mr. Monteux struck fire in the flash from the music of Tasso's pride; the courtly division of the tone-poem was smiling and gracious; the finale of glorification swelled with pomps and power. It was Liszt's music made music-drama, alive anew with romantic ardor that new times and tastes have been known to leave threadbare. Once again illusion was born of it. As many a time last winter, Mr. Monteux's instincts of the opera house heightened and deepened his version of symphonic music.

In good case, too, were conductor and orchestra with Monsieur Pierné's arrangement for a new medium of Franck's Prelude, Choral and Fugue. Being practised conductor, applying for such purpose the resources of instrumental choirs—and not unmindful at need of effect upon an audience—he has made the transcription with craftsman's skill, but hardly with the flashes of divining and recreating imagination that Mottl, for example, when the mood was on him, could bring to like work. As it seemed in a single hearing, the arrangement tended to prolong the appreciable lengths of Franck's piano-piece; while the music spread over a full orchestra seemed also to spread thin. The listening faculties again followed the long ascendant line of the music richly unfolding, cunningly and imaginatively interlaced. They perceived anew Franck's signal and distinctive ability to make serene rhapsody mount from the earth and cleave the heavens. Yet both Monsieur Pierné and Mr. Monteux missed graduations of this ascent, modulations of music and mood, finely attuned relationships that such pianists as Mr. Bauer readily discover in the original piece. Father Franck was aware of the various media for music, skilled and sensitive to them. When he wrote this Prelude, Choral and Fugue, he knew, as his own homeliness of speech might put it, "what he was about." Yet the transcription was not uninteresting while Mr. Monteux and, especially, his string choir were incisive and rhythmic in the Prelude and the Fugue, capable of sustained and expansive instrumental song in the Choral and of large, uppiled sonorous climax at the end.

Again Lekeu's Orchestral Fantasia summoned the finer, the more characteristic powers of conductor and band. In itself and in performance the piece stirred the audience to the heartiest applause of the afternoon, warm as it had been when Mr. Monteux first came to his place and warm as it was to be at the end of "Tasso." Indeed, the wonder was that the Fantasia had never before been played at the Symphony Concerts. The two "folk-songs of Anjou" lying behind the Fantasia are, as they should be, but means to a work of the composer's imagination. From one Lekeu derives the motiv whence upspring the music of his nocturnal dance of peasants—sharp-set, keenly rhythmed, beating high and glad, yet with a hint of that which is heard remote and darkling. To the other folk-song Lekeu owes the motiv germinating the music of the lovers longing as they stray from the dance into the sweetness of nocturnal solitudes à deux.

The Fantasia becomes work of the imagination in the half-fantastical, half-homely thrill that Lekeu imparts to this music of the dance; only a little less, since no demon is present, than the like thrill in Liszt's "Mephisto-Waltz." It is such work again when the motiv of amorous longing penetrates the music of revel, infuses itself, as it were, into the chosen pair. Again imagination speaks out of the music when the dance-motiv, rising and falling, seems to follow them into the woodland shades, until at last the music of desire melts it into itself. And the Fantasia ends—in the stilled intensities of a solitude and a passion needing no speech.

Throughout, Lekeu's workmanship is no less imaginative and even more individual. Seldom with his measures of dance or of desire does he succumb to the mere rhetoric of sumptuous and sonorous music-making—an easy rhetoric in his youth of the late eighties and the early nineties. Everywhere else he plies the economy and directness of musical means dear in our day to Ravel and twenty other composers. Everywhere else he writes a lean-bodied, fine-fibred, keen-edged music of this our particular time—nakedly graphic of the dance, pitched low but deep with the lovers' desire, tingling upon ear and imagination when either impulse haunts the other. Had Lekeu lived he would have been now in his fifty-first year. By the token of this Fantasia, of his chamber-pieces, of other fragments, what music might he not have written. And Death took him in his youth—barbarous, unthinking Death.

As the Fantasia was written, so also was it played with Mr. Monteux's fine instinct for a graphic music that his own imagination can visualize, with more than his usual sensibility. There remains, then, for courteous quarrel only his and the orchestra's version of the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, the little, the gay, the almost freakish symphony, with which the composer whiffed away a time by no means untroubled. Now, as some of us read and feel this music, rightly or wrongly, it is light, playful, fanciful, almost Mozartean, asking a sprightly, sensitive, adroit hand in the conductor, an equal animation, finesse and elegance in the orchestra. The nicest of modulations should fleck it like sunshine; play of motivs should dart and flash; the long, fine lines of the composer's design should be gracefully, sportively graded. Above all, the tone of the orchestra should be as light and transparent, as variously inflected as the music itself. Even when the rhythm is deliberately and humorously monotonous as Beethoven willed, the beat should be of the lightest; while gamesome and gay as of high spirits, should be the harmonic twist and turns, the prancing chords of the Finale. Beethoven could be gay—and boisterous, as sundry music proves. He could, also, as in this symphony in F major, be gay and nimble.

Agreed that throughout the symphony, Mr. Monteux's pace was as lively as ear or fancy could wish; that the third movement might even have gained, in contrast to its neighbors, by a little slower gait and a little rounder progress. Agreed also that he missed none of the contrasts leaping out of the music to eye and ear. Agreed further that he knows and feels his Beethoven when wood-winds or horns sing under and through the nervous strings; when a racing Finale halts and opens for a jet of warm song. Even so, was not the tone of the orchestra needlessly thick and hard in the first movement and the progress through it superfluously strenuous? And where, where was the elastic modulation, as it were in flow of gayety which this Allegro clearly invites? Mr. Monteux took the Finale at a dashing pace, but he could not or he would not escape too solid tone, too sharp and reiterated emphases. Both haunted it, while lightness, brightness, elegance came not. Such grace and flow again evaded the conductor and orchestra in the minuet, delicately and minutely as he sought to weave it. And where was the inflections that should play over the second movement and make it sound like to the sight of sunshine among leaves when the breeze touches them? Again Mr. Monteux was consciously exact, deliberately suave, assiduously artful. Time and again, in the year that Boston has known him, in the very music yesterday of Liszt and Lekeu, he has been an interesting, eloquent, persuasive, even a stimulating conductor—but not, not in the symphonies of Mozart or Haydn or in this little symphony of Beethoven.

CONCERTS IN PROSPECT

Brahms, Bauer and Mr. Monteux's Next Programme—A Week of "Men-Singers" with Werrenrath, Hackett and Burke—Kubelik and Kreisler at Hand

PIECES already heard at the Symphony Concerts fill Mr. Monteux's programme for Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. One is the thrice-familiar and perennially brilliant overture to Berlioz's opera, "Benvenuto Cellini." Another is Brahms's concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra—the less exacting of the pair to the hearer, and, perhaps the warmer in imagination. The third is Enesco's symphony in E-flat major, heard at a pair of concerts in Dr. Muck's time, but since unrevived. It is the largest and not the least interesting of his orchestral pieces. In the concerto, Mr. Bauer, eloquent always with such music, will play the piano-part. In order the programme stands:

Symphony in E-flat major..............Enesco
Concerto in D minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra ....Brahms
Overture to the Opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz
Pianist: Harold Bauer

On Thursday evening the Symphony Orchestra will begin its annual series of concerts in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, and again Mr. Bauer will be "assisting artist," but he will play Schumann's—and not Brahms's—concerto. The full programme is:

Symphony in F major, No. 8.........Beethoven
Overture to the Opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz
Concerto for Pianoforte with Orchestra, Schumann
Symphonic Poem, "Tasso"..............Liszt
Pianist: Harold Bauer

TRAN. Oct. 9.

—Last Friday and Saturday in Symphony Hall, Boston, the fortieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give five concerts in the Academy of Music here, opened in brilliant fashion. Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster, recently arrived after a long voyage from Norway, is the only principal newly come to the orchestra this season. Burgin is a native of Warsaw, but his training has taken place largely in Russia, and the latter part of his career, owing to chaotic conditions in the East, was confined to Russia, Finland and Scandinavia. For 12 years he served as concertmaster in the fine orchestras which the larger cities of those countries possess. His first teacher was Lotti and his most famous teacher was Leopold Auer, with whom, at Petrograd, Burgin studied four years. Burgin toured Russia, Poland, Finland and Scandinavia with a great deal of success, playing as soloist in Petrograd, Kieff, Moscow, Odessa, Copenhagen and elsewhere. He has been concertmaster and soloist with the Petrograd Symphony Orchestra, the Helsingfors Symphony Orchestra, the Christiania Philharmonic Society and the Stockholm Concert Society. In Europe he has played as concertmaster under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Max Fiedler and Nikisch, likewise under Richard Strauss and Schneevoight, the Finnish conductor. He led a notable string quartet in Christiania and formed the Burgin Quartet in Stockholm, which toured from city to city giving 12 concerts each season.

Tickets by subscription are now on sale for the five concerts to be given in Philadelphia on the following Monday evenings: November 1, November 29, January 3, January 31 and March 14. The soloists to appear at these concerts are Helen Stanley, Jean Bedetti, Alfred Cortot, Hulda Lashanska and Erno Dohnanyi.

Bauer, Symphony Soloist

The second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be notable in that Harold Bauer will play with the orchestra as the first soloist of the year. The program will open with the symphony in E-flat major by Georges Enesco. Brahms' pianoforte concerto No. 1, in D minor, will be played by Mr. Bauer. The concerts will end with Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Symphony Concert Programs

The opening of a new Symphony season always arouses a certain amount of speculation concerning the items likely to appear during its course on our musical bills of fare. We know of one subscriber to the concerts whose chief anxiety on the subject is jokingly said among his acquaintances to be the chance of hearing a composition by Philip Emanuel Bach, or is it Friedemann Bach? Once years ago one was actually played, and since then he lives in hopes of another one being vouchsafed him.

For our own part it is more Bruckner and more Volkmann we long for. We would gladly have traded the complete works of Saint-Saens, which we think we must have heard under Rabaud, for one more performance of that Seventh Symphony of Bruckner which seemed when we once heard it the nearest to Beethoven of anything not Beethoven we knew.

As for Volkmann he seems a sort of 19th century Haydn, born too late, and so lessened in relative magnitude. We get so little of the original Haydn nowadays that perhaps it is injudicious to crave lesser Haydns.

Apart from such minor masters one claims as a right certain great classics traditionally performed every other year, the Beethoven symphonies, the Brahms' symphonies, the three best-known Mozart ones, the Wagner overtures and preludes, the "Coriolanus," "Egmont," "Leonore No. 3," Brahms' "Tragic" and "Academic," Berlioz and many others of long repute. One hopes also for such recent classics as "The Afternoon of a Faun," "Scheherezade" and the Franck symphony.

Last year Mr Monteux gave us full quota of standard and recent classics, except for Brahms, whose reputation in France is for some reason much smaller than it has become everywhere else, and except for Mozart, where he substituted an unfamiliar and inferior "Concertante Symphony" for one of the immortal three.

His novelties were a welcome variation from those offered by his Teutonic predecessors, which were too often what the Germans themselves have named "conductor's music," thoroughly scholarly, but thoroughly dull. Instead or such routine overtures and pedantically aspiring symphonies, Monteux gave us ballet music of the sort he had conducted during his service with the Ballet Russe and the Metropolitan Opera. We delighted in dances from "Prince Igor," excerpts from "Le Coq d'Or," a suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" and other brilliant masterpieces.

Only one composer was missing from the moderns we wanted to hear, except Strauss, who was banished for obvious reasons. That was Skriabin, whose "Poem of Ecstasy" seemed when we heard it before the greatest masterpiece produced since Wagner died. We are still hoping for more Skriabin "at these concerts."

Lastly among the American compositions, so many of which escape greatness only because they lack an "indefinable something" called genius, we had the work of Griffes, which if it missed the heights of European achievement missed them by a very narrow margin indeed. May we beg respectfully for more Griffes?

Personal whims aside, every one will agree that Mr Monteux has a genius for program making, on the evidence of last season. We may all look forward to a series of concerts in which each one brings at least one piece we thoroughly enjoy. No more need we dread the off days at Symphony Hall when former conductors used to work off their moribund classics and perfunctory "novelties" in a batch.

Cambridge Symphony Plans

The usual series of eight concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given beginning next Thursday evening. The other dates are Nov 11, Dec 16, Jan 13, Feb 10, March 24, April 7 and April 28. The soloists are Harold Bauer, Katharine Goodson and Felix Fox, pianists; Eva Gauthier and Alice Neilson, sopranos; Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, and Antonio Gerardi, violinists; and Alwin Schroeder, the veteran 'cellist.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, second program. Symphony in E flat major, Georges Enesco; pianoforte concerto No. 1, Brahms; overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz. Soloist, Harold Bauer.

Items and Incidents

Upon the programme for the third pair of Symphony Concerts, Mr. Monteux has happily set Sibelius's first symphony—the first piece also of his music to be heard at them (where it once flourished) since the winter of 1917-18. It is characteristic of the conductor's catholicity and curiosity so to restore Sibelius to just place in the active repertory. Le bonhomme Rabaud admitted that he had never heard of him and, since he was unknown in Paris, had no desire to make his acquaintance.

There were diversions, unexpected, if momentary, at both the Symphony Concerts of last week. Twice, on Friday afternoon, a masculine voice cried "Bravo" which is not the usual form of applause among the elect company of the matinées. Twice again, on Saturday evening, rhetorical pauses between Franck's Chorale and the succeeding Fugue and at one of the turns of "Tasso," deceived an auditor into single-handed clapping. There were smiles and shrugs; yet such an eager listener is worth while.

Except from a few malignant old [illegible] in and out of the newspapers, there [illegible] a word of objection to the [illegible] of Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration" in the first concert of Mr. Bodanzky's orchestra last week in New York, where not a note of the Bavarian's music has been heard during three years. Instead, the audience listened eagerly and applauded heartily. With a seeming touch of regret, one of the protestants admits that in music, "the war is a dead issue"—and happily so.

The illustrious virtuosi who lead the various sections of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to its personnel at the opening concerts last Friday and Saturday, are unchanged from past years, except in the case of Richard Burgin, the new concertmaster, who recently arrived after his long voyage from Norway in time to be present at the first rehearsals for the opening pair of concerts in Symphony Hall.

To lead the string sections in the Orchestra, Ferdiand Thillois came from France to sit at the head of the second violin section in 1918, while Frederic Denayer and Jean Bedetti came likewise from Europe last autumn to be first viola and first 'cello respectively. These two fine musicians have more than confirmed their reputation abroad as worthy to be ranked among the few masters of their instruments now living.

Of longer standing in Boston are Max Kunze, leader of the double basses, and Julius Theodorowicz, second concertmaster, whose career in Boston dates back to his participation in the Kneisel Quartet. Alfred Holy, the illustrious first harp, is well known indeed to all who are familiar with the orchestra. The veteran among the wood-wind is Georges Longy, who has been named authoritatively as without peer among living oboists. Alfred Sand, the Russian virtuoso, is now serving his seventh year as first clarinet. The newer comers are Georges Laurent, first flute Abdon Laus, first bassoon, and Louis Speyer, English horn, who are now in their third season with the Orchestra. There are, strictly speaking, two English horn ployers, in that Mr. Speyer alternates with Mr. Frederick Mueller, who has played this beautiful wood-wind instrument for many years with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and under several conductors.

Of the brass choir, Carl Hampe, as first trombone, is the veteran among the leaders, while George Wendler, as first horn, comes second in length of service. Georges Mager is now serving his second season as brilliant first trumpet. Stefan Neuman is perhaps as familiar as any single member of the orchestra on account of his agility and unerring accuracy upon the kettle drums.

BOSTON IS 'OFF MAP MUSICALLY'

Philip Hale Says Loss of Place Largely Due to Motors and Bridge

CRITIC DISCUSSES SYMPHONY TROUBLE

Philip Hale, dramatic and music critic of The Herald, addressing the Boston Music Publishers' Association last night at the Parker House, declared that Boston, which a score of years ago justly laid claim to being the musical centre of the United States, at present is "off the map musically." He stated that automobiles and bridge whist parties are in a large measure responsible for the present condition.

After alluding to the high position the city occupied in the music world when he first came to Boston in 1899, when the choral societies, the church choirs and other musical organizations were of a character unequalled by those of any other in America—he declared that today we have "only the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Symphony Maligned

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra," said Mr. Hale, "has been damnably maligned and maliciously talked about, not only here, but in New York." With regard to the so-called strike last March by certain members of that orchestra, Mr. Hale characterized Frederic Fradkin, deposed concert master, as a "hot-headed young violinist," but he also said that there was no question that the chairman of the board of trustees was "woefully lacking in tact."

The attempt at that time to disrupt the Symphony orchestra, he declared, was a result of German propaganda, the inception of the propaganda-spreading campaign being in Germany, but much of the effective work being done by a local man, who spread accounts of higher wages being paid in symphony orchestras in other cities. "There were men in the orchestra," continued Mr. Hale, "who, I'm ashamed to say, did not want to play under a French conductor."

He lamented the decline of the Handel and Haydn Society, which today is "farmed out," and that there is no body of singers which the public will pay money to hear. In order to get a large audience at a choral recital the fact that an important artist has been engaged to appear has to be widely advertised by some enterprising manager. He recited the names of familiar string quartets which once pleased old Boston audiences, and then asserted that today there are none of such exceptional values.

In order to obtain a sizable audience today at almost any sort of musical recital the word has to be passed on by a society leader, Mr Hale said, and in these cases a large proportion of those who attend are present, not because they know or appreciate music, but because they have been told by an influential person that they must hear or see so and so Many of them applaud things that they would have been bored stiff listening to years ago

Jazz Has Helped

Extreme jazz music has been beneficial in the respect that it has taken many composers out of the solemn rhythm in which they had been working for many years, said Mr. Hale. He also had a favorable word for graphophones, saying that they enabled tired business men to enjoy bits of music they would not otherwise hear. "I pity the man," he added, "who cannot enjoy "Jasper, I Hear You Calling Me" and "Robert E. Lee," for they are infinitely better than the pieces produced by some of you gentlemen."

Music of the future he said rests with the publishers and not with the conductors, and the publishers should support the best and not "get the idea that any one nation has a divine right to music." It is their duty to press the music of every country.

William Arms Fisher, one of the Oliver Ditson Company's composers, was called upon by James A. Smith, president of the association, and referred to the "subtle criticisms" written by Mr. Hale. He said they were "kindly" and yet told the "truth." Winslow Bruce, boy soloist at Trinity Church, and Walter D. Pidgeon, baritone, sang several songs.

Here in Boston

Mr. Monteux has set notably interesting music in the programme for the third pair of Symphony Concerts on Oct. 22 and 23 Three modern pieces fill it—the first symphony, in E-minor, of Sibelius, too long unheard at Symphony Hall; a "Divertissement" for orchestra by Ropartz, hereabouts a relatively little known French composer of the elder generation, and Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," discovered by Mr. Fiedler, revived by Dr. Muck and at each performance stirring hearers to lively satisfaction or as vigorous resentment. For a composer of his individuality and influence, Skriabin has had as yet small place in the Symphony Concerts. Some day we may even hear his "Prometheus."

TRAN Oct. 14.

Schumann, Mr. Bauer and Others

Save in one item, the programme of the Symphony Orchestra's concert in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge last evening was derived from those of last week's and this week's concerts in Boston. From the former came Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Liszt's "Tasso," and from the latter Berlioz's Overture to his opera "Benvenuto Cellini." But while the soloist of today, Mr. Bauer, was heard last night, his chosen piece was Schumann's concerto, not Brahms's. Doubtless many would have appreciated the substitution of Lekeu's Fantasia for the "Tasso," but Mr. Monteux evidently desired the grandiloquent close which Liszt's symphonic poem affords. As we learn from the programme-book, an orchestra of truly modern proportions played the Eighth Symphony when it was first heard, and in a hall that accommodated three thousand people, yet there is no gainsaying that like the symphonies of Haydn, which it resembles at least in spirit, the piece sounds to better advantage in Sanders Theatre than in a larger auditorium. It is possible to find this "little symphony," as its composer called it, the most engrossing of the nine. In certain of the others Beethoven scaled greater heights and plumbed greater depths. But nowhere is he more resourceful in handling his material or more fertile in the invention of arresting effects—the clicking chords in the second movement, the twittering violins and the explosive C sharp in the finale. Perhaps it was because of the different conditions that Mr. Monteux's (and the orchestra's) performance seemed more flexible, less rigid, than in Boston. It has been said that emotional music wears the quickest, and by that token the greater freshness of the Eighth Symphony is readily understandable.

Had Berlioz been content to write according to the models of his time instead of anticipating the manners and methods of fifty years hence, he would have escaped the suggestion of amateurishness which is not infrequently found in his music. On the other hand he would have given us no excuse for the wonder which he must inevitably feel when we listen to it with a thought for its historical surroundings. In this overture as elsewhere Berlioz is weakest when he attempts sustained melody. He was following a sure instinct when he strove to get away from the square-cut periods of the classical school, but he failed to find a satisfactory substitute. The cantilena near the beginning of the piece is amorphous, and the broken chord accompaniment, on which Berlioz generally relied in such situations, is as bald as anything in Donizetti.

Once that is over with, the overture is a succession of fascinating episodes, and for sheer dazzling brilliance its instrumentation is still unparalleled. How different this brilliance from the blatancy of Liszt's musical flag-raising at the end of "Tasso"—not without its stimulation to the auditory nerve, but yet so trumpery. Aside from the rhetorical melancholy of the opening, which is still impressive, and the soaring melody of the 'cellos which follows, "Tasso" has little to commend it. The episode of the poet at the court of Ferrara is not without a certain charm, but it is almost forgotten in the empty din of the end.

In adding two more movements to his "Allegro Affetuoso," to make his piano-concerto, Schumann descended somewhat from the level of his first inspiration, and the piece as a whole has no such unity as the first division would have had, did it stand alone. Nevertheless we should be grateful for the beauties that these added movements contain, particularly the melody for 'cellos and violas in the Intermezzo. And while the finale has the least to offer of any, it furnishes the excitement without which no concert-piece is supposed to be complete. Nowhere else in his symphonic music does Schumann write with such sustained eloquence—and such coherence—as in this Allegro Affetuoso Moreover, to no pianist of our times is it given to play that entrancing passage which begins the "development" as Mr. Bauer plays it. Here for an instant is the very soul of beauty. For that matter the whole concerto seems to be peculiarly Mr. Bauer's own. The performances of other pianists, however praiseworthy, only serve to enhance the recollection of his. And last evening he was once more wholly in the vein. Throughout he brought to Schumann's music the beauty of tone and warmth of imagination that is its meed. In his hands the melodies of the first movement sang, the phrases of the Intermezzo were lightly carved and flung aside, and the passage-work of the finale ran with due speed and never with haste. And always there was abundant feeling for the poetic quality that sets the piece apart from other concertos.

RICH FARE IN PROSPECT

MR. MONTEUX OUTLINES PENDING PROGRAMMES

A Wide Range for the Symphony Concerts Next Season—The Classics in Due Place and With Sundry Rediscoveries—Young Englishmen, "New" Italians, a Risen Spaniard, Promising Parisians, Fresh Russians, in Novel Music A-Plenty—Good Share for Americans as Well

THE present conductor of the Symphony Orchestra respects its tradition of widely ranging programmes. In the days when the strewing of scornful epithets upon any and all Germans was a favorite pastime, it was the custom to call his predecessors narrow-minded. Perhaps they were; yet from the first years of Mr. Gericke through the final years of Dr. Muck, they set and maintained a precedent: The repertory must be catholic. Whether a piece of music came from French, German, Czech, Italian, Scandinavian, Russian or American pen, whether it was classic or semi-classic, modern or ultra-modern, it deserved performance, so long as it was impressive, interesting or otherwise significant. As presumption went, the public of the Symphony Concerts was no less open-minded, becomingly curious, as well, about newer and innovating composers. The conductors persisted; audiences usually proved worthy of their good name; and so a fine tradition was established, unexcelled in any orchestra at home or abroad. Mr. Monteux, as the scope of his programmes last season proved, received and cherishes it. Personally, moreover, he has the cosmopolitan outlook; his eagerness for novel and interesting music is unabating; he reads new and old scores unceasingly; he is diligent in the exploration of publishers' shelves; he likes nothing better than to upturn an overlooked piece by a classic or a semi-classic composer, to open the way to an unknown and deserving man. In fine, he would make the Symphony Concerts a mirror of the music of our immediate time no less than a glass reflecting the classics in living image. For Mr. Monteux, music is music, according to intrinsic desert, whatever the nationality of the composer, whatever the date upon the sheets. Modestly and wisely, he counts it the obligation of a conductor to seek tactful contacts with composers and publishers rather than to hold them waiting on his door-step. With these ends in view he journeyed to London and Paris last summer; while annually he purposes to renew these European visits.

[illegible] faith and [illegible] shaped programmes through his [illegible] son as established conductor of the [illegible] phony Concerts. In Boston and in other cities, they pleasured the public, maintained the standards of the orchestra, won him just laurels, heartened the youth of all ages to whom the new and strange is not a fearsome thing. In his second season, beginning next month, he intends to make the repertory yet more varicus and stimulating, so far as twenty-four programmes give him room and there is time and energy for thorough preparation. Daily he is at his studies in the conductor's room at Symphony Hall; soon he will be at the steady work of rehearsals and concerts, both without haste and without rest.

So far as the conductor can accomplish his present plans, English composers from Bantock to Bax will enjoy their first considerable inning at the Symphony Concerts. Four of the "new" Italians, who cultivate symphonic music, will have place. There will be room for the rising Spaniard, de Falla, and for the risen Parisians, Milhaud and Roger-Ducasse. Music of one of the younger Russians, Vassilenko, will be played for the first times in America. An unheard symphony—his third—by Sibelius, the Finn, is in prospect, along with the suite for the concert-hall that Mr. Carpenter has assembled from his ballet, "The Birthday of The Infanta," and a new tone-poem by Mr. Hill, suggested by Poe's grewsome tale, "The Fall of The House of Ussher." From the classics, likewise, Mr. Monteux is minded to rediscover to his hearers at Symphony Hall Schubert's "Tragic Symphony," by way of variation from the endlessly repeated "Unfinished" and Ninth; the gay overture to Mozart's opera, "Il Seraglio" and his prelude to "Don Juan"; and two overlooked concertos of Bach to be played as ensemble pieces—one with violin, flute and piano for outstanding instruments and one with the organ in like place.

Two symphonies by English composers stand high on Mr. Monteux's list of new pieces—Vaughan-Williams's "London Symphony" and Bantock's symphony, "The Hebrides." No music in the larger forms by the younger Britons has been more applauded than this "London Symphony," reaction in tones to the life, atmosphere and stimulus of the Britons' city. In a sense it is "the piece of the hour"; for in America next winter it will be heard in Boston, New York and Chicago. In recent years Bantock's symphony has made the round of English concert-rooms. The aspect and the spirit of those wild islands in the North Atlantic kindled the composer to the music. The melodic material he has drawn from the islanders' folk-tunes. To one of the youngest and most individual of English composers Mr. Monteux has also given ear—Arnold Bax—and one or another piece of his symphonic music is fairly certain to gain place on the conductor's programmes. He likes, too, the vigor, the onrush, the eminently British quality of John Ireland.

Orchestral scores by four of the "new" Italian composers now lie upon Mr. Monteux's desk—Respighi, di Sabata, Malipiero and Casella. The piece by Respighi is in current verbiage a "tone-picture" of four of the familiar fountains of Rome. It has been already played in America by Mr. Stock's orchestra in Chicago and, if memory serves, by Mr. Damrosch's in New York. Sabata's music is a suite of poetized sights and sounds in the country. From Malipiero, whom Mr. Monteux encountered and liked last June in Paris, he has received the two parts of the "Impressioni dal Vero," each in three divisions and again "tone-picturing" in the composer's highly imaginative fashion. One set at least of these "Impressioni" will be played at the Symphony Concerts next winter and after Malipiero's "Pause del Silenzio" of two successive seasons, anticipation warms to them. By common consent Casella is vivid and pungent master of harmonic and instrumental means. He loves, too, a large fervor of expression, a red fire of movement. It has lately pleased him to score for full orchestra, utilized to the utmost, Balakirev's glowing, fantastic piano-piece, "Islamey." It will make vivid, sonorous end to one of the conductor's pending programmes. Another piece, altogether Casella's own, also awaits his hand, "The Convent by the Water" suite, if recollection does not slip, from a highly fanciful piece of the theatre.

Little by little a younger generation of Spaniards, almost wholly unknown to American ears, has made way into the concerts of Paris and London. Of one of them, Turina, Mr. Monteux thinks but poorly. Another, de Falla, he appraises highly. Accordingly, the public of the Symphony Concerts is to hear an orchestral suite from his pen for which his songs, as sung hereabouts by Mme. Gauthier or Miss Janacopulos, raise expectation.

The younger Parisian to whom Mr. Monteux inclines for promise become performance, is Darius Milhaud, barely known in America by a quartet for strings occasionally played by "The Flonzaleys."

Philip Hale Says Loss of Place Largely Due to Motors and Bridge

CRITIC DISCUSSES SYMPHONY TROUBLE

Philip Hale, dramatic and music critic of The Herald, addressing the Boston Music Publishers' Association last night at the Parker House, declared that Boston, which a score of years ago justly laid claim to being the musical centre of the United States, at present is "off the map musically." He stated that automobiles and bridge whist parties are in a large measure responsible for the present condition.

"I pity the man," he added, "who cannot enjoy "Jasper, I Hear You Calling Me" and "Robert E. Lee," for they are infinitely better than the pieces produced by some of you gentlemen."

Music of the future he said rests with the publishers and not with the conductors, and the publishers should support the best and not "get the idea that any one nation has a divine right to music." It is their duty to press the music of every country.

William Arms Fisher, one of the Oliver Ditson Company's composers, was called upon by James A. Smith, president of the association, and referred to the "subtle criticisms" written by Mr. Hale. He said they were "kindly" and yet told the "truth." Winslow Bruce, boy soloist at Trinity Church, and Walter D. Pidgeon, baritone, sang several songs.

Here in Boston

Mr. Monteux has set notably interesting music in the programme for the third pair of Symphony Concerts on Oct. 22 and 23. Three modern pieces fill it—the first symphony, in E-minor, of Sibelius, too long unheard at Symphony Hall; a "Divertissement" for orchestra by Ropartz, hereabouts a relatively little known French composer of the elder generation, and Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," discovered by Mr. Fiedler, revived by Dr. Muck and at each performance stirring hearers to lively satisfaction or as vigorous resentment. For a composer of his individuality and influence, Skriabin has had as yet small place in the Symphony Concerts. Some day we may even hear his "Prometheus."

TRAN Oct. 14.

Schumann, Mr. Bauer and Others

Save in one item, the programme of the Symphony Orchestra's concert in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge last evening was derived from those of last week's and this week's concerts in Boston. From the former came Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Liszt's "Tasso," and from the latter Berlioz's Overture to his opera "Benvenuto Cellini." But while the soloist of today, Mr. Bauer, was heard last night, his chosen piece was Schumann's concerto, not Brahms's. Doubtless many would have appreciated the substitution of Lekeu's Fantasia for the "Tasso," but Mr. Monteux evidently desired the grandiloquent close which Liszt's symphonic poem affords. As we learn from the programme-book, an orchestra of truly modern proportions played the Eighth Symphony when it was first heard, and in a hall that accommodated three thousand people, yet there is no gainsaying that like the symphonies of Haydn, which it resembles at least in spirit, the piece sounds to better advantage in Sanders Theatre than in a larger auditorium. It is possible to find this "little symphony," as its composer called it, the most engrossing of the nine. In certain of the others Beethoven scaled greater heights and plumbed greater depths. But nowhere is he more resourceful in handling his material or more fertile in the invention of arresting effects—the clicking chords in the second movement, the twittering violins and the explosive C sharp in the finale. Perhaps it was because of the different conditions that Mr. Monteux's (and the orchestra's) performance seemed more flexible, less rigid, than in Boston. It has been said that emotional music wears the quickest, and by that token the greater freshness of the Eighth Symphony is readily understandable.

Had Berlioz been content to write according to the models of his time instead of anticipating the manners and methods of fifty years hence, he would have escaped the suggestion of amateurishness which is not infrequently found in his music. On the other hand he would have given us no excuse for the wonder which he must inevitably feel when we listen to it with a thought for its historical surroundings. In this overture as elsewhere Berlioz is weakest when he attempts sustained melody. He was following a sure instinct when he strove to get away from the square-cut periods of the classical school, but he failed to find a satisfactory substitute. The cantilena near the beginning of the piece is amorphous, and the broken chord accompaniment, on which Berlioz generally relied in such situations, is as bald as anything in Donizetti.

Once that is over with, the overture is a succession of fascinating episodes, and for sheer dazzling brilliance its instrumentation is still unparalleled. How different this brilliance from the blatancy of Liszt's musical flag-raising at the end of "Tasso"—not without its stimulation to the auditory nerve, but yet so trumpery. Aside from the rhetorical melancholy of the opening, which is still impressive, and the soaring melody of the 'cellos which follows, "Tasso" has little to commend it. The episode of the poet at the court of Ferrara is not without a certain charm, but it is almost forgotten in the empty din of the end.

In adding two more movements to his "Allegro Affetuoso," to make his piano-concerto, Schumann descended somewhat from the level of his first inspiration, and the piece as a whole has no such unity as the first division would have had, did it stand alone. Nevertheless we should be grateful for the beauties that these added movements contain, particularly the melody for 'cellos and violas in the Intermezzo. And while the finale has the least to offer of any, it furnishes the excitement without which no concert-piece is supposed to be complete. Nowhere else in his symphonic music does Schumann write with such sustained eloquence—and such coherence —as in this Allegro Affetuoso Moreover, to no pianist of our times is it given to play that entrancing passage which begins the "development" as Mr. Bauer plays it. Here for an instant is the very soul of beauty. For that matter the whole concerto seems to be peculiarly Mr. Bauer's own. The performances of other pianists, however praiseworthy, only serve to enhance the recollection of his. And last evening he was once more wholly in the vein. Throughout he brought to Schumann's music the beauty of tone and warmth of imagination that is its meed. In his hands the melodies of the first movement sang, the phrases of the Intermezzo were lightly carved and flung aside, and the passage-work of the finale ran with due speed and never with haste. And always there was abundant feeling for the poetic quality that sets the piece apart from other concertos.

RICH FARE IN PROSPECT

MR. MONTEUX OUTLINES PENDING PROGRAMMES

A Wide Range for the Symphony Concerts Next Season—The Classics in Due Place and With Sundry Rediscoveries—Young Englishmen, "New" Italians, a Risen Spaniard, Promising Parisians, Fresh Russians, in Novel Music A-Plenty—Good Share for Americans as Well

THE present conductor of the Symphony Orchestra respects its tradition of widely ranging programmes. In the days when the strewing of scornful epithets upon any and all Germans was a favorite pastime, it was the custom to call his predecessors narrow-minded. Perhaps they were; yet from the first years of Mr. Gericke through the final years of Dr. Muck, they set and maintained a precedent: The repertory must be catholic. Whether a piece of music came from French, German, Czech, Italian, Scandinavian, Russian or American pen, whether it was classic or semi-classic, modern or ultra-modern, it deserved performance, so long as it was impressive, interesting or otherwise significant. As presumption went, the public of the Symphony Concerts was no less open-minded, becomingly curious, as well, about newer and innovating composers. The conductors persisted; audiences usually proved worthy of their good name; and so a fine tradition was established, unexcelled in any orchestra at home or abroad. Mr. Monteux, as the scope of his programmes last season proved, received and cherishes it. Personally, moreover, he has the cosmopolitan outlook; his eagerness for novel and interesting music is unabating; he reads new and old scores unceasingly; he is diligent in the exploration of publishers' shelves; he likes nothing better than to upturn an overlooked piece by a classic or a semi-classic composer, to open the way to an unknown and deserving man. In fine, he would make the Symphony Concerts a mirror of the music of our immediate time no less than a glass reflecting the classics in living image. For Mr. Monteux, music is music, according to intrinsic desert, whatever the nationality of the composer, whatever the date upon the sheets. Modestly and wisely, he counts it the obligation of a conductor to seek tactful contacts with composers and publishers rather than to hold them waiting on his door-step. With these ends in view he journeyed to London and Paris last summer; while annually he purposes to renew these European visits.

In such faith and practise Mr. Monteux shaped programmes through his first season as established conductor of the Symphony Concerts. In Boston and in other cities, they pleasured the public, maintained the standards of the orchestra, won him just laurels, heartened the youth of all ages to whom the new and strange is not a fearsome thing. In his second season, beginning next month, he intends to make the repertory yet more varicus and stimulating, so far as twenty-four programmes give him room and there is time and energy for thorough preparation. Daily he is at his studies in the conductor's room at Symphony Hall; soon he will be at the steady work of rehearsals and concerts, both without haste and without rest.

So far as the conductor can accomplish his present plans, English composers from Bantock to Bax will enjoy their first considerable inning at the Symphony Concerts. Four of the "new" Italians, who cultivate symphonic music, will have place. There will be room for the rising Spaniard, de Falla, and for the risen Parisians, Milhaud and Roger-Ducasse. Music of one of the younger Russians, Vassilenko, will be played for the first times in America. An unheard symphony—his third—by Sibelius, the Finn, is in prospect, along with the suite for the concert-hall that Mr. Carpenter has assembled from his ballet, "The Birthday of The Infanta," and a new tone-poem by Mr. Hill, suggested by Poe's grewsome tale, "The Fall of The House of Ussher." From the classics, likewise, Mr. Monteux is minded to rediscover to his hearers at Symphony Hall Schubert's "Tragic Symphony," by way of variation from the endlessly repeated "Unfinished" and Ninth; the gay overture to Mozart's opera, "Il Seraglio" and his prelude to "Don Juan"; and two overlooked concertos of Bach to be played as ensemble pieces—one with violin, flute and piano for outstanding instruments and one with the organ in like place.

Two symphonies by English composers stand high on Mr. Monteux's list of new pieces—Vaughan-Williams's "London Symphony" and Bantock's symphony, "The Hebrides." No music in the larger forms by the younger Britons has been more applauded than this "London Symphony," reaction in tones to the life, atmosphere and stimulus of the Britons' city. In a sense it is "the piece of the hour"; for in America next winter it will be heard in Boston, New York and Chicago. In recent years Bantock's symphony has made the round of English concert-rooms. The aspect and the spirit of those wild islands in the North Atlantic kindled the composer to the music. The melodic material he has drawn from the islanders' folk-tunes. To one of the youngest and most individual of English composers Mr. Monteux has also given ear—Arnold Bax—and one or another piece of his symphonic music is fairly certain to gain place on the conductor's programmes. He likes, too, the vigor, the onrush, the eminently British quality of John Ireland.

Orchestral scores by four of the "new" Italian composers now lie upon Mr. Monteux's desk—Respighi, di Sabata, Malipiero and Casella. The piece by Respighi is in current verbiage a "tone-picture" of four of the familiar fountains of Rome. It has been already played in America by Mr. Stock's orchestra in Chicago and, if memory serves, by Mr. Damrosch's in New York. Sabata's music is a suite of poetized sights and sounds in the country. From Malipiero, whom Mr. Monteux encountered and liked last June in Paris, he has received the two parts of the "Impressioni dal Vero," each in three divisions and again "tone-picturing" in the composer's highly imaginative fashion. One set at least of these "Impressioni" will be played at the Symphony Concerts next winter and after Malipiero's "Pause del Silenzio" of two successive seasons, anticipation warms to them. By common consent Casella is vivid and pungent master of harmonic and instrumental means. He loves, too, a large fervor of expression, a red fire of movement. It has lately pleased him to score for full orchestra, utilized to the utmost, Balakirev's glowing, fantastic piano-piece, "Islamey." It will make vivid, sonorous end to one of the conductor's pending programmes. Another piece, altogether Casella's own, also awaits his hand, "The Convent by the Water," suite, if recollection does not slip, from a highly fanciful piece of the theatre.

Little by little a younger generation of Spaniards, almost wholly unknown to American ears, has made way into the concerts of Paris and London. Of one of them, Turina, Mr. Monteux thinks but poorly. Another, de Falla, he appraises highly. Accordingly, the public of the Symphony Concerts is to hear an orchestral suite from his pen for which his songs, as sung hereabouts by Mme. Gauthier or Miss Janacopulos, raise expectation.

The younger Parisian to whom Mr. Monteux inclines for promise become performance, is Darius Milhaud, barely known in America by a quartet for strings occasionally played by "The Flonzaleys."

s and the piece in his "Epic mediaeval in suggestion, utilizing liturgical music of his country. Kalinnikov, an older Russian composer, who has occasionally figured upon programmes in America, has also provided a symphony new to Bostonian ears. To Stravinsky Mr. Monteux, after their long collaboration with Mr. Diaghilev's ballet, instinctively turns. From "Petrushka"—the mimodrama of puppets at a Russian fair, seen and heard of old in Boston—the composer once drew a suite for the concert-hall. The conductor believes he can reproduce it. And the music of Rimsky-Korsakov is by no means exhausted. Upon Mr. Monteux's music-rack is the overture to his opera, "A Night in May;" accessible in New York is the suite chosen and sewn together from another opera, "The Tale of Tsar Saltan" in the composer's rich vein of fantastic legend. Near neighbor to these Russians, as the land, though hardly the spirit, goes, is the Finn, Sibelius none of whose music has lately been heard at the Symphony Concerts, persistently as Mr. Fiedler and Dr. Muck gave it vogue. Both overlooked his third symphony. Mr. Monteux will undertake it. The clanging and familiar first also tempts the conductor.

And the Americans to whom Mr. Monteux has long lent a receptive ear? Two of their pieces for which he waits have already been specified—Mr. Carpenter's ballet-suite and Mr. Hill's tone-poem. Add to these, if a performance can be arranged, Mr. Arthur Shepherd's concerto for piano and orchestra, a much-praised music among his fellow composers; a revival of Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and of Mr. Carpenter's gay feat of ingenuity and humor, "Adventures in A Perambulator"; certain extremely modern "sketches"—no more than six minutes long—by an obscure New Yorker, discovered by Mr. Monteux; and a deserved repetition of the late Mr. Griffes's "Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan," and the more imaginative American voices will not go unheard at Symphony Hall through the winter.

To complete the circle the Germans. From them the classics—Bach and Mozart as already recited; Beethoven in at least two symphonies and sundry miscellaneous pieces; the symphony of Schubert aforesaid, another from Schumann; the fourth symphony of Brahms; the usual modicum of Wagner in the concert-room. Finally, hope of Strauss in the finer-fibred tone-poems. Mr. Monteux does not lack admiration or zest for them. Like the rest of us, he is curious to discover how lapse of years and change of taste have affected impression from them and pleasure in them. He is well aware that other conductors purpose to bring them back to American concert-halls. From their fortunes and from the public of the Symphony Concerts in Boston he awaits a cue. As a cosmopolitan musician, he is valiant for Strauss; as a Franco-American conductor, he would also be discreet.

BAUER SHOWS RARE SKILL AT THE PIANO

Harold Bauer's skillful management of the piano part in Brahams' D minor concerto was the most interesting feature of yesterday's Symphony concert. Probably some of the audience thought during the performance of the fact that this concerto is the one Bauer chose for his American debut, at a Symphony concert Dec 1, 1900. It is obviously a favorite with him, since he also played it here in 1914.

Yet it is scarcely a masterpiece, and has never been popular wth performers or audience. It is an early work, distinctly mediocre in thematic material, and labored in development, though there are moments which foretell the glories of the symphonies. Mr Bauer, perhaps, looks at the music from a pianistic rather than a musical standpoint. He certainly makes the most of the many opportunities afforded him to prove his technical skill, and his understanding of the style of Brahams.

Enesco, whose Symphony in E flat filled most of the rest of the afternoon, once said that his music was derived from both Wagner and Brahms. Although it is certainly true that his orchestration and some of his rhythmic devices are akin to Brahms, and even more obvious that his melodies have been influenced by Wagner, his music seems closer to Tschaikowsky than to anything else.

He is not guilty of the glaring lapses of taste to which the Russian was subject. Neither has his work the sheer emotional power that to many critics redeems the vulgarities of the "Pathetic Symphony." Enesco, in short, has everything needed by a symphonist except genius.

Mr Monteux, after dealing conscientiously with Brahms and Enesco, evidently found satisfaction in the rather tawdry brilliance of Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." The superb orchestration helps the effectiveness of performance in such music, but the conductor ably seconded the composer's intention, and made the piece seem more alive than it really is.

The trouble with all three numbers is that no one of them contains a profoundly beatiful melody, or a genuinely powerful motive for development. Not by endless taking thought can a composer secure these things. Yet no amount of skill in orchestration or genius for harmonic invention can compensate for their absence in orchestral or in any other music.

Next week the orchestra will play Sibelius's First Symphony; Skriabin' "Poem of Ecstasy"; and a "Divertissment" by Ropartz, (first time in America). There is to be no soloist.

BAUER ASSISTS AT SYMPHONY

Masterly Performance Is Given by Pianist at Afternoon Concert

PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK ANNOUNCED

By PHILIP HALE

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Harold Bauer, pianist, assisted. The program was as follows: Enesco, Symphony in E-flat major; Brahms, Pianoforte Concerto No. 1; Berlioz, Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

This concert, although it evidently gave the great audience pleasure, does not call for laborious comment. The three compositions were more or less familiar, yet it is doubtful whether the first movement of the Roumanian-Parisian symphony would be fully grasped after several performances; it is so complex in the working of inner voices; nor are the motives with the possible exception of the chief theme, of such a salient character that they compel admiration. The second movement is beautiful in its melancholy mood, its gravity that is not austere, its emotional depth. The Finale is spirited and without any too deliberate endeavor on the part of the composer will inevitably provoke hearty applause, when it is played as spiritedly as it was played yesterday. Enesco, a singularly accomplished musician; a violinist and a pianist; as a composer has his own idiom, although he has said that the influence of Wagner and Brahms is shown in his works. This idiom is not easily grasped, any more than the idiom of Delius, or of the Scriabin of the later years.

Mr. Bauer's devotion to the first piano concerto of Brahm's is equalled only by that shown in the Micawber family on a certain memorable occasion. No, Mr. Bauer will not forsake this concerto of Johannes. He played it here 20 years ago, when he first appeared as a pianist in this country. He played it again in 1914, And he has written about it and his fondness for the granitic work. It is true that he plays it uncommonly well; one might say, better than it deserves, for it is far inferior to the second concerto, and for the most part is intolerably long drawn out and dull. The masterly performance only brought out the inherent dryness and forbidding nature of too many pages. Only in the Adazio is there a poetic breath.

A brilliant performance of Berlioz's overture, now nearly 100 years old, brought the concert to a close. How fresh it sounds today! More modern than many orchestral works composed during the last 20 years.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program next week is as follows: Siblius, Symphony in E Minor No. 1; Guy Ropartz, Divertissement (first time in America); Scriabin, "The Poem of Ectasy."

The management announces that in future late-comers will be admitted during the performance of a symphony only after the first movement. The doors will be closed during the pauses between the other movements.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Pierre Monteux has arranged an interesting program for the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. A notable revival will be the First Symphony of the Finnish composer, Sibelius, long popular at these concerts.

The novelty of the program will be a divertiissement for orchestra by Guy Ropartz, the talented pupil of Cesar Franck, which will on this occasion have its first performance in America.

The final number will be the revolutionary "Poem of Ecstasy," by the Russian, Scriabin, and which is said to express the joy of untrammeled activity.

BAUER'S ART AMAZES AT SYMPHONY

Master Pianist Plays Brahms' D Minor Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

The D minor concerto of Brahms is the most Scandinavian music that can be imagined. Music of northern nature and northern gods, who might thus contend on the mountain tops. This work was given a remaarkable performance by Harold Bauer as pianist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The other compositions on the programme were Enesco's symphony in E-flat, an early work, of a noisy character, and Berlioz' overture to his opera, "Benvenuto Cellini."

RUGGED AND BEAUTIFUL

It is no wonder that the audience applauded and repeatedly recalled Mr. Bauer. He has played this concerto, which is too rarely heard, before with the Boston Symphony. Doubtless his conception of the music continues to broaden and deepen with the years. Certainly this is one of the compositions which have no limit of wonder for the listener. It seems with every hearing—at least at the hands of this pianist—that the music is more rugged, dramatic and grandly beautiful.

As one of the few examples of really great and enduring art, this concerto has at once the boundless energy and the underlying vast repose of nature. Especially, be it noted again, northern nature. The first theme, stark, heroic, Scandinavian, leaps out of the orchestra with much of the shattering force, the blinding energy of the lightning flash. Theme clashes against theme. The orchestra is full of gray and storm. Yet there are other episodes entirely congruous with the composer's idea, of the most lofty and poetc beauty, as sudden marvellous vistas might be seen between the lifting of clouds or the lines of cragged peaks.

Has Right to Play It

A frightful task for a pianist! And one of the distinctions of Mr. Bauer's performance is that it never sounds that way! Strength, virtuosity, tonal loveliness go hand in hand. His sense of instrumental ensemble and his profound knowledge of his score make him one of the very few who have the right to interpret this music. Nor should Mr. Monteux's superb conducting go unmentioned. Two admirable musicians collaborated with memorable results. Thank heaven that the concerto is so hard to play, that it looks so ungrateful to the pianist anxious to make a quick, superficial success. He will leave it alone, as he should. Where this music is concerned only great artists should apply.

Enesco's Work Noisy

Enesco, the Rumanian, was 25 when he composed his symphony. To those who have ever tried to write any music for orchestra this accomplishment on the part of a young man of 25 speaks for itself. It is enormously difficult to write any symphony at all. Having said this, it is fair to add that the symphony is not particularly worth hearing. It has by no means the individuality of mood and idiom that the suite, op. 9, possesses. It is thickly, brassily orchestrated in the first and last movements, showing unmistakably the influence of Brahms, whom we greatly prefer in his undiluted state, with an occasional admixture of a modern French ninth or a bouquet of augmented chords. Most of the instruments are going all the time. There is so much counter-point, so muddily arranged, that half the time you are scratching your ear trying to find out which melody is the principal one in the tonal mass. The form of first and last movements is deadly orthodox.

The movement which remains in the memory is the second, in which, after some dark chords sprung from the underground caves of the Nibelungen, some music that is legendary and melancholy is heard—music which offers more than a foretaste of the later Enesco, a man who, when he speaks his own musical language in his own way, arrests the attention of the writer and communicates certain artistic impressions which are not communicated by any other modern composer.

POST

BAUER SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

Yesterday afternoon marked the second of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conducting.

Mr. Harold Bauer, the soloist, played Brahms Pianoforte Concerto, No. 1, in D minor. This is the third time Mr. Bauer has performed his composition with Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first time was in 1900, again in 1914 and yesterday afternoon. Mr. Bauer played with much brilliance and assurance. His interpretation of the second movement, "Adagio" (which in form is an ornamentation of a single theme) was tender tho' temperate. He asserted his brilliance of technique and style in the last, a rondo form, "Allegro non Troppo." The large audience rendered enthusiastic and appreciative applause.

The first number on the program was an E flat major symphony by Georges Enesco. Boston has heard this splendid work before. As performed by the orchestra yesterday its magnificance was apparent. The first movement climbs height after height until at length the climax is reached with full orchestral strength. The second movement "a Lament" on three notes is full of beauty. Its ending is appealing. The last movement is all that the tempo mark expresses "Vif et Vigoreux."

Berlioz, overture "Benvenuto Cellini" was the last number on the program. Its performance merited the warm applause which it received.

The concert next week will include Sibelius's E minor Symphony No. 1,and "Le Paeme de L'Extase" by Ccriabin.

TRAV. Oct. 16.

Sibelius and Skriabin on Mr. Monteux's Next Programme—Mme. Galli-Curci in Routine—Mr. Kreisler, Mr. Kubelik and Mme. Homer at Hand — The London String Quartet at Harvard

TWO composers neglected at the Symphony Concerts since the departure of Dr. Muck will return to them on Mr. Monteux's programme for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—Sibelius, the Finn, and Skriabin, the Russian. Sibelius will speak through the large clangors, the deep voiced eloquence, the seething progress of his symphony in E-minor, first of the series. Skriabin, in turn, will be heard in his one symphonic piece that has found way into the repertory of the Boston Orchestra——"The Poem of Ecstasy," charged and surcharged with a singular and poetizing rhapsody and rich in purely musical suggestion. Both pieces, moreover, should kindle Mr. Monteux's best powers. The third item on the conductor's programme is novel, a "Divertissement,"—no doubt a variation of an eighteenth-century "Divertimento"—by Ropartz, French composer of the elder generation too little known in America. In order the programme stands:

Symphony in E minor, No. 1..........Sibeliu
Divertissement ....Ropart
Poem of Ecstasy.........................Skriab

SYMPHONY CONCERT

FROM ENESCO, THROUGH BRAHMS TO BERLIOZ

Orchestra, Conductor and, in Particular, Mr. Bauer in the Vein — The Roumanian's Music of Native Wildness—The German's Cool Charm and Musing Voice in His First Piano-Concerto—The Parisian's Overture of the Opera House

MOST things worked together for good, and also for pleasure, at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. The programme was relatively long, since it could hardly be otherwise with Brahms's piano-concerto in D minor upon it, and as further happened an uncommonly lengthy intermission. There must be contrasting pieces to this many-paged and generally exacting Concerto, if the audience is to be primed before it and soothed after it. Mr. Monteux chose Enesco's symphony in E-flat, unheard at Symphony Hall through five years, and a "standard" overture, Berlioz's to his opera, "Benvenuto Cellini." Both invite the conductor's familiar abilities and accord with the present progress of his refilled orchestra. "To a resolute intellectual scrutiny," as Mr. Shaw used to say, when he felt the oats of his own superiority, the symphony may not yield too much. Yet it "sounds"; the first and the last divisions move ardently, vigorously at moments tumultuously; while the slow section between is surcharged with a melancholy hungry for expression. Enesco can ply rhythm, lay on color, sharpen contrast, intensify mood. So also can Mr. Monteux and the orchestra with him. The composer likes to fling about sonorous, largely hewn masses of tone, to upbuild broad climaxes, to proceed in sharp transitions. So also does the conductor; while the band, as it now is, readily answers to both. Sombrely moves the slow division and all concerned readily sustain its quality. Of kin in time and degree is Berlioz's overture.

Displayful passages for single instruments or groups of instruments recur, and our orchestra does not lack adept and alert virtuosi. The music moves impetuously, abruptly or else halts the while for orotund song. All is motion, color, sharp effect and broad impression. Mr. Monteux, in and out of the opera house, excels in such music and is bringing his orchestra to like excellence—the more quickly, the more easily, for the new concert-master's obvious zest for both. Already it is possible to discover Mr. Burgin's incisive bowing, broad phrasing, quick sense of rhythm and generally communicating energy stimulating the string choir.

Brahms's concerto is, of course, music of another voice. In the progress of it sensitive ears readily discovered the lack of middle tints in the orchestra's present shading, of middle force in its present gamut of power, of fine modulations, gradients, euphonies, of the golden glow that is halo upon orchestral tone and that even Brahms, once called the muddy in such things, often hears in imagination and forthwith summons. But these are the virtues of a band at summit of perfections and not in eager and loyal advance toward them. Let them come, as time and tide bring them. Besides, there were compensations. Mr. Monteux, being intelligent over every sort of music, abides by the precedent set by Mr. Fiedler and Dr. Muck with Brahms—the tradition—since it has now become such—of pre-voiced, mettlesome, keenly rhythmed and warmly colored performance. The four horn-players, moreover, had only to meet once more Brahms's imagination for their instruments with their own sensibility.

There was also Mr. Bauer—in his own particular dominion, so to say, when a piano-concerto of Brahms is to be played. Be it the first, as it was yesterday, or the second, as it was nearly five years ago, there is no pianist now traversing "these concerts" to match him in such music save only Mr. Gabrilowitsch. Mr. Bauer has the perceiving mind and the reveal-ing hand. Thereby he opens the design of Brahms, and the clearer when it is abstruse or intricate. Mr. Bauer has the divining mind and the communicating touch. Thereby he enters into Brahms's musical thought and poetizing moods and imparts them, feelingly to hearers. The pianist possesses the selective faculty and the discriminating finger. Therefore, he does not play the long concerto as though every measure in it were of equal worth and impression. He is unemphatic with tonal paragraphs that Brahms himself knew were only filling; he does not labor over measures that cannot and will not "sound." For this concerto in D minor dates from no more than the twenty-seventh year of the composer's young age.

Finally, Mr. Bauer is sensitive and secure master of the voice of the piano. He never forces it; he never turns mechanical; always, unless a composer absolutely defeats him, he keeps it musical and individual. His touch can traverse all the gradation of tone; his imagination ranges over the whole palette of color. Neither exposition nor song, neither play of figures nor play of ornament, baffle him. Incandescent he seldom is; but the concerto of Brahms does not exact that quality; while always he is luminous. He knows out of himself the passion that is quite as much of the mind as of the heart—and that he can transmit and enhance it—and that is the passion of Brahms in the piano concertos. With reason conductor, orchestra and audience rose to such a pianist, achieving no mean task.
